Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he regretted that the Bill should not be approved by so distinguished an officer as Lord Fitzhardinge, who had done so much for the manning of the navy. Times had changed since the formation of the force, when men were alarmed at the possibility of having to serve in war time on board one of Her Majesty's ships. Now, the whole merchant service was proud of belonging to the Naval Coast Volunteers and Naval Reserve. It would be almost an insult to the coasting men of the country, if they were not allowed to participate in any future war; no doubt, they would be just as ready to serve the country then as the Naval Reserve could be. But without some alteration of the existing Act, it would be practically impossible to make use of those men. Suppose the case of a ship like the Alabama chased by our Channel vessels. It would contravene the Act of Parliament for our cruiser having Coast Volunteer men on board to proceed further than 300 miles from the coast, and so she might be obliged to turn round just as she was on the point of coming up with the chase. It was very well to say that the captain in such a case would proceed, but in doing so he would contravene the terms of the Act. It should be understood, however, that the Bill had not a retrospective effect; it would not apply to men now in the force, unless they entered afresh, expressly under its provisions.

Question, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 3^o, and passed.

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, March 17, 1863.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILL—Committee—Union Relief Aid Act (1862) Continuance (No. 35).

EDINBURGH CASTLE—GUNPOWDER STORE.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE rose to ask the noble Lord the Under Secretary for War, Whether it is the case that 100 Tons of Gunpowder are stored in Edinburgh Castle; and, if not, what is the quantity usually kept there? The noble Lord said, he had been induced to give direct attention to this subject, owing to the statements made in a correspondence in one of the Scotch newspapers. There appeared to be no doubt whatever that there was a large quantity of gunpowder stored in the Castle, and it was apprehended, that if an explosion were to occur, there would be an immense destruction of property and loss of life. It appeared to him that there was no necessity for so large a quantity of powder being stored in the Castle. He understood, moreover, that there was less necessity for it, as there were proper magazines elsewhere in which any quantity might be stored. He hoped the noble Earl the Under Secretary for War, would be able to appease the minds of the people of Edinburgh on the subject.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON replied that his noble Friend had been rightly informed as to the amount of powder kept in Edinburgh Castle. In fact, at the present time there were 2,700 barrels, containing somewhat more than 100 tons; but it must be remembered that from this store issues were constantly made: the issues amounted to 2,000 barrels annually, and therefore during the greater portion of the year the quantity in store was small. The powder, which was kept in a bomb-proof magazine, as secure as such a magazine could be, was served out to the whole of the southern district of Scotland for the purposes of the artillery, line, and Volunteers. It had been customary, for a long period of time, to keep a considerable amount of gunpowder in Edinburgh Castle; and as no such disaster as the noble Earl had suggested had hitherto occurred, he trusted we might enjoy for the future the same security which we had experienced in the past.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, though he did not apprehend an explosion, he thought, that if they could avoid storing so large a quantity of gunpowder in the Castle as 100 tons, they ought to do so. He understood that there was a large magazine at the head-quarters of the Artillery; and if that were true, he thought it advisable that the greater portion of the powder should be kept at that place.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY called attention to the position of the Tower of London. A large quantity of new rifles was there at the present time, together with other valuable stores. Now, he had observed that on the quays between the Tower and the river, which he believed belonged to Her Majesty's Government, there were piled immense masses of crates, wood, hay, and other inflammable materials. If those materials were to take fire, nothing could save the Tower, and it would be a fearful calamity to have the Tower burnt a second time.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, the Tower was a storehouse from which issues were constantly made. He was not aware that combustible matter had been allowed to accumulate upon the wharf, but he would make inquiry on the subject.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, that there was an excellent magazine at Edinburgh Castle, and he apprehended that a large quantity of powder was stored there simply for this reason, because it was the safest place in which it could be kept.

House adjourned at half past Five o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, March 17, 1863.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Public-houses.

First Reading—Sale of Gas Act Amendment [Bill 61]; Writs Prohibition (No. 2) [Bill 62]; Statute Labour Roads and Bridges (Scotland) [Bill 63]; Statute Labour Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Transfer [Bill 64]; Thames Embankment (South Side) [Bill 65].

Select Committee—on Thames Embankment (North Side) Bill, nominated.

Committee—Consolidated Fund (£10,000,000).

Report—Consolidated Fund (£10,000,000).

Third Reading—Post Office Savings Banks [Bill 22]; and passed.

Bill withdrawn—Writs Prohibition [Bill 34].

TICKETS OF LEAVE.—QUESTION.

MR. PERRY WATLINGTON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If the following conditions are not still endorsed upon Tickets of Leave granted to Convicts in England; and, if not, whether he will lay upon the table of the House a copy of the Conditions upon which such Licences are now granted:—1. The power of revoking or altering the Licence of a Convict will most certainly be exercised in case of his misconduct. 2. If, therefore, he wishes to retain the privilege which by his good behaviour under penal discipline he has obtained, he must prove by his subsequent conduct, that he is really worthy of Her Majesty's clemency. 3. To produce a forfeiture of the Licence it is by no means necessary that the holder should be convicted of any new offence. If he associates with notoriously bad characters, leads an idle and dissolute life, or has no visible means of obtaining an honest livelihood, &c., it will be assumed that he is about to relapse into crime, and he will be at once apprehended and recommitted to prison under his original sentence?

SIR GEORGE GREY, in reply, said, the conditions referred to were not, and never had been, in force in England. If the hon. Gentleman would move for the form of the licence under the Act, and the notice endorsed upon it, there would be no objection to produce them.

BANKRUPTCY RETURNS.—QUESTION.

MR. MURRAY said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General, When the Annual General Return, judicial and financial, required under the 67th section of the Bankrupt Act, 1861, to be framed from the Returns made to the Chief Registrar of the Court of Bankruptcy, will be laid before Parliament?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, in reply, that some delay had occurred in obtaining the Returns from the country, but that he hoped to lay them on the table the first day the House met after the Easter recess.

RIOTS AT CORK.—QUESTION.

MR. VANCE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he had received any Report of the damage which had been inflicted on the citizens of Cork during the riots which took place on the evening of the 10th of March, and if any of the perpetrators of such outrages had been made amenable to justice; if not, what steps the Government intended to take for that purpose?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, that no doubt considerable injury had occurred in consequence of the disturbances which took place at Cork on the night of the 10th of March. The Government had cause to be aware on the previous Saturday that it was probable that some disturbances would occur, and in consequence of a requisition, addressed to the Government, eighty additional constabulary were sent into the town. During the night in question considerable rioting took place in Cork, and those tradesmen and other citizens of the place who had illuminated their houses had their windows broken, and the Mayor of Cork himself was roughly handled. About four o'clock in the morning a body of infantry was sent from the barracks; but when the soldiers arrived where the disturbances took place their services were no longer necessary. He believed that some of the perpetrators of the outrages had been brought before the local courts and were likely to be made amenable to justice. In consequence of a requisition forwarded to the Government, and of a communication from the Mayor of Cork, the Government had offered a reward of £50 for the discovery of the disloyal perpetrators of those outrages.

PUBLIC-HOUSES.—LEAVE.

MR. SOMES moved for leave to bring in a Bill for closing Public-houses on Sundays. The hon. Member said, he would defer entering into an explanation of the details of the measure until the Motion for the second reading.

MR. PACKE said, it would be contrary to justice, and entirely opposed to the feelings of the people of this country that accommodation should not be afforded for supplying refreshments at public-houses on Sundays. Though he was opposed to improper drinking and riotous conduct on Sundays, yet he thought the Bill now sought to be brought in for entirely closing public-houses on Sundays would be fraught with such injustice; especially to the poorer classes, that he should take the somewhat unusual course of opposing its introduction.

SIR GEORGE GREY stated, that having been communicated with by the hon. Member who proposed to introduce this Bill, he told him, that as it was unusual to oppose the introduction of a Bill, he should offer no opposition to the Motion for leave to bring in the Bill; but he gave the hon. Gentleman no hope that he would assent to the Bill on the second reading. Subject, therefore, to the understanding that he must not be supposed to give any sanction to the measure, he was willing to assent to its introduction.

MR. BAINES hoped the hon. Member (Mr. Packe) would not persevere in opposing the introduction of the Bill, which had been asked for by thousands of the most worthy, the most intelligent, and the most religious of the population. It was in principle the same as that which had been applied in Scotland, where it had been found to succeed thoroughly—and not merely to have succeeded, but to have received almost the universal assent of the people and even of the publicans. Perhaps the Bill might require some amendment, but that could be done in Committee.

MR. ROEBUCK begged to give notice that in the very improbable event of this Bill being read a second time, he should, on its going into Committee, move the addition of a clause including every club in London on the Sunday in its provisions.

MR. HORSFALL said, he was surprised at the opposition to the Bill. It appeared to him that the law was most inconsistent. The sale of bread and meat and necessaries of life on Sundays was prohibited; but the public-houses were thrown open to the people, where they might purchase intoxicating liquors. He could not understand that system of legislation. In his constituency the Bill had the support not merely of a large portion of the people but of the publicans. He should certainly vote for the Motion for leave.

MR. PACKE said, he would not persevere in dividing the House on the question of leave.

Question put, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill for closing Public-houses on Sunday."

And there being several voices in the negative,

The House divided :—Ayes 141; Noes 52: Majority 89.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. SOMES and Mr. PEASE.

GAME LAWS.

SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. W. E. FORSTER rose to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the laws relating to Game. The hon. Member said, that until he saw the Amendment of the hon. Member for Whitby (Mr. Thompson) on the paper, he was in hope that there would have been no objection to this proposal. The grounds for that hope were the feeling which he knew pervaded the country, and the apparent desire of the House last Session to have the matter fully investigated. He understood that last year hon. Members on both sides, not only of the House, but of the Game Law question, were in favour of an inquiry; and his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, in reply to a question on the subject put by the hon. Member for Thirsk (Sir W. Gallwey), admitted that inquiry was necessary prior to any alteration of the law, and said, that if a Motion were made for inquiry in the course of the next Session, he should not oppose it. Soon after that a Bill came down from the House of Lords, and was passed. It was possible, therefore, that some Gentlemen who thought it desirable to have an inquiry before the Poaching Act was passed might think it unnecessary when that measure had been carried. He believed, however, it would have been more satisfactory to all concerned had the case for that Act been more fully and deliberately examined. Had they had an inquiry before the Bill—which came down from the other House a Night Poaching Bill and went back a General Poaching Bill—was brought in, it might have saved much discussion and several of the divisions that took place upon it. The hon. Member for Whitby, however, had now given notice of an Amendment on his Motion, and in that Amendment the hon. Gentleman said, that the Motion ought to be postponed until the House had longer experience of the working of the recent Act. In his opinion, however, the present position of that Act justified the demand for an inquiry. The Act in the hands of the lawyers who had to administer it had been found a most difficult measure. Difficulties had arisen in regard to its interpretation; there had been delay in giving judgment, and there had been contrary decisions. At last Chief Justice Erle had given an opinion on the question, which, of course, coming from such a quarter, had great weight. It must be remembered, that when the Bill came down from the House of Lords, it threw the onus probandi on the defendant; but a majority of the House removed that obligation. The decision of Chief Justice Erle restored the Act to the shape in which it came down from the other House, putting practically the onus probandi upon the defendant, and making the possession of game, under suspicious circumstances, evidence upon which a conviction might be obtained. He did not say that that was contrary to the opinions of a majority of the House, but he did say that it was contrary to what was supposed to be the Bill at the time it was passed, and therefore that there was reason for inquiring whether the fact was as he stated; and, if so, whether the law was what the House wished it to be. There was yet another and a stronger reason for inquiry—namely, whether it was desirable that new powers should be given to the police for the protection of one particular kind of property. He doubted, indeed, whether the Act did not give the rural police powers which they had never possessed before with regard to any kind of property; but there could be no doubt about it, so far as game was concerned. It had been said that the Act had been successful, and that it had tended to prevent the crime of poaching. If that was so, did it not remove from the preserver some portion of the necessity he was formerly under of watching for himself? If the new law was successful, he could not imagine that gentlemen would be so fond of paying money to keepers and watchers that they would do so to the extent they thought necessary before the Bill came into operation. And the question arose, at whose expense were these additional precautions against poaching to be taken? That was an inquiry which he could assure the House the ratepayers—in other words, the tenant farmers—had been asking in many places since last Session. That point ought to be deliberately considered by a Select Committee. Again, in the passing of this Act, Parliament embarked upon a new course of legislation; and the House ought to consider how far they wished to pursue it. The Bill as it came down from the House of Lords defined poaching to be “having game unlawfully in possession;” as it went back to their Lordships, it was altered to “game unlawfully obtained.” The difference was not very clear; but the difficulty which was felt in the matter showed that they were clothing game with a character different from everything else. The hon. Member for Berks (Mr. Walter) strongly insisted on the necessity of declaring game to be property. The Bill, however, passed the House without that having been done. Whether that course ought to have been taken or not, there could be no doubt that the passing of an Act, under circumstances which rendered it necessary to alter the definition of the offence, made a fresh inquiry indispensable; and the time had now arrived when they should finally determine whether or not game should be regarded as private property. These were the grounds on which he (Mr. W. E. Forster) would reply to the suggestions of his hon. Friend the Member for Whitby, that they should wait for some time, in order to see how the new Bill worked. He now came to the general reasons why he pressed for an inquiry into the Game Laws. Sixteen years ago a Select Committee sat upon this subject. Their investigations lasted two Sessions, and they published two large blue-books, which he had lately been studying, and which he found to be at once informing, and in some respects amusing. It was not likely that any new Committee which the House could now appoint would exceed the industry or ability which the former one had shown; but there were many circumstances that rendered the prospects of another inquiry more hopeful than they were sixteen years ago. At that time the country had just concluded the severe contest on the Corn Laws, and there was a good deal of opposition between country and town, which he trusted had now disappeared. Of that opposition he could find many traces in the blue-book, and there was no doubt that it had greatly interfered with the action of the Committee. But the abolition of the Corn Laws had rendered it also desirable to discuss what was called the economical question of the Game Laws—namely, how far the farmer, who was now exposed to the competition of the whole world, was weighed down by the quantity of game which was kept upon his land. There was also another reason why an inquiry would be more hopeful at the present juncture. There had been, for the last ten or twenty years, a growing wish on the part of all classes to consider the condition of the labouring poor. He (Mr. Forster) was not going to prejudge the question whether it was for the interest of the poor that the Game Laws should or should not be altered; but still it was the opinion of many that such should be the case, and he thought that the point was at least worth discussion. It appeared, too, that the operation of the existing laws had not diminished, but, if anything, had rather increased the offence of poaching. He had carefully gone over the statistics, but owing to the constantly-varying manner in which the Returns were made out from year to year he had found it impossible to make any exact comparison. He found, however, that in the three years 1858-60, there had been an average number of 8,590 cases per annum of persons brought before the magistrates charged with offences against the Game Laws. He believed that that was an increase, but he was bound to add that there did not appear to be any increase in the more serious crimes resulting from poaching. He did not think, either, that there was any increase in the number of persons imprisoned—a fact for which he accounted in two ways:—First, he was inclined to attribute it to a growing desire on the part of the justices to administer the law in a more lenient manner; and secondly—which was not so satisfactory a reason—he believed the greater demand for game had so increased that the illicit dealers had been able to supply the poachers with money with which to pay the fines. In considering what the House should do to put a stop to poaching, the first thing they had to consider was, what were the special temptations to the offence of poaching. He thought they might be comprised under three heads. First, the love of sport. He was told that that was less prevalent now than formerly among the lower classes, and that the old sporting poacher had gone out of date. But he did not know why that should be so. The love of sport had not diminished amongst the gentlemen of England, and he did not see why it should have done so amongst the peasantry. The second temptation was the hope of gain, strengthened by the greater facilities which now existed for getting game to market. But he believed the great cause why poaching continued, and must continue, notwithstanding any laws they might pass, was the existence of over-preserving in places bordering upon densely-populated districts. The amount of poaching was determined more by the quantity of game preserved in any given neighbourhood, and by the density of the population near, than by any other circumstance. The way, therefore, to get rid of this particular offence was to get rid of excessive preserving. He was no sportsman himself. From accidental circumstances he had not begun to shoot when he was young, and it was not likely that he should now take it up, except at a target. But he could fully understand and sympathize with a love of sport; and he did not believe that it would be kindness to any class in the country—to the farmer or to the labourer—wholly to exterminate game. He believed that a moderate amount of it did no harm, but was rather an advantage, because it offered an inducement—though he thought that inducement had been somewhat exaggerated—to gentlemen to reside upon their property in the country, and thereby increase the prosperity of those around them. He believed that it was a great advantage to train the country gentlemen to reside on their estates, and to become good working justices; but they must take care that they did not at the same time train the peasantry to be criminals. Last year there was some discussion whether a poacher was a thief. In some cases he was, and in others he was not; but he believed that though the poacher did not usually begin as a thief, he often ended by becoming one. Of course, a gentleman had a right to over-preserve if he liked. It was to be lamented that he should do so, but still he could not be legally prevented. But while it would be a cruelty to the labouring man so to alter the law as to induce him to break it by poaching, on the other hand they ought as legislators to do all in their power to diminish the temptation to which he was exposed, by discouraging excessive preserving. Now, a most important question was, were they proceeding upon right principles in their efforts to prevent poaching? That there was something very peculiar in the position of game was obvious, or the chief-constables would not have memorialized the House last year against the employment of the police, directly or indirectly, in its preservation. But it was most essential, if they wished to repress poaching, that the law should be clear, which was at present by no means the case. Besides, the law had not the support of public opinion. There was no country in the world in which the law, especially as it regarded property, was so generally respected, and yet by no class of its people was poaching looked upon as standing in the same category with other crimes. He supposed it would be admitted that to take an egg would be held to be as much poaching as anything else; and yet the hon. Member for Denbigh (Mr. Mainwaring) last year complained that his keepers were principally employed in preventing persons from searching for eggs for the neighbouring gentry. The country gentlemen, therefore, could not look upon poaching as theft, or they would not countenance such a practice as that referred to by the hon. Member. Whatever might be the case with regard to its words, the law was anything but clear as to its principle. It was yet undecided what was the legal nature of this crime, whether it was in the nature of larceny or not. An illustration of this uncertainty was supplied by a case tried not two years ago before Mr. Justice Willes, in which some rabbits had been taken by poachers on an estate of the Marquess of Exeter. The rabbits were seized at the Stamford Station, and the dealer commenced an action against the persons who had taken them from him. The case was tried at the next assizes. Mr. Justice Willes said, that if a person went upon land belonging to the Marquess of Exeter and killed rabbits, and then carried them away and sold them to a fishmonger, the servants of the Marquess had no right to go to the fishmonger's shop and take them away from it; that the property was in the fishmonger, although the taking of the rabbits on the land was an act of trespass. The learned Judge also declared that he could not understand how such a law should exist; because, if a man had land, and chose to keep pheasants upon it, he never could see why the law of larceny should not apply to such a case; for, according to all principle, the pheasants should belong to the man who created the property, just as much as though they were domestic fowls. ["Hear, hear!"] The Gentleman who cheered would, no doubt, vote for his Motion; for if they agreed with the learned Judge that the law should be altered, that was surely a good reason for inquiry into the matter. [Mr. NEWDEGATE: What is the date of that decision?] It was at the summer assizes of 1861. The verdict was against the Marquess of Exeter. Surely, when a Judge stated that the law ought to be altered, that was a good reason for inquiry. There was, however, an appeal from the verdict then given, on the ground of misdirection of the jury by the Judge, and the rule was argued about the beginning of 1862 by four Judges of the Common Pleas. All the four Judges in the mean time had had their attention called to a case which had been decided some considerable time ago, and all four gave a contrary opinion to that previously given by Mr. Justice Willes, that learned Judge himself being one of them; and a new trial was granted. The case came on in the Exchequer Chamber, and was determined only a month or two ago. It was argued before Lord Chief Baron Pollock, Mr. Justice Blackburn, Mr. Baron Martin, and Mr. Baron Wilde. The decision as reported was headed to this effect:—"Rabbits—property in animals feræ naturæ—rabbits started and killed on the property of another the property of the person on whose land they are found." Mr. Baron Wilde, while concurring in the ruling of his brother Judges, after referring to the former state of things, said that at present there was a vast quantity of game in this country which never stirred from the enclosed property of the landowner; but it was too late now for the courts of law to meet this change of circumstances by declaring a right of property in game, and that any legislation establishing an absolute or qualified right in the owner of land to property in the game on his estate would be consonant to justice and to the policy of the common law. Now, although the proposition was stated at the heading of the report of these decisions, that rabbits, wherever started, are the property of the person on whose lands they are killed, yet he (Mr. Forster) could not ascertain that the law was so settled; and, indeed, he had received precisely opposite opinions on the question from eminent lawyers. Surely such statements as these, coming from the judicial bench, showed the necessity of having this question inquired into, and inquired into without delay. With regard to the question of property, if the House thought fit to grant a Committee of Inquiry, he could only say he should go into it with a mind unbiassed as to how they should solve the question of property in game. He should certainly go into the inquiry with this feeling—that they ought to rest the law as far as possible on property alone. They ought to find how far there could be property in game, and on that rest their measures for its protection. It was to be observed that when Justice Willes said he could not understand why a pheasant should not be the property of the man who preserved land for its support, that was on the supposition that he could identify his property. But he (Mr. W. E. Forster) thought it would be very difficult to decide about meum and tuum in the case of animals which on one side of a hedge belonged to one man, and on another side belonged to another, and when in the public road belonged to neither one nor the other. He thought the Committee should go into that question with a feeling that it was rather a scandal that it had not yet been decided. He should be prepared to act on this principle:—Let them give a man this right in property, as far as possible, without infringing the principles upon which property was founded; but let not the owner expect anything else; let him not expect to have protection beyond that which his right of property gave him. The Committee, he thought, should settle not only this question, but should remove every relic of the old forest and feudal law which still remained. They should inquire whether the gamekeeper was at present an official; if so, he ought not to remain so. A private policeman was contrary to the temper of the times. Then, if game were property, it must be settled whether it was not the property of the occupier of the land; whether it was not his own like the crops and the cattle on the ground, and whether, being his own, he had not the right to kill it when and how he pleased. He thought he had pointed out two or three topics which were quite sufficient for the consideration of the Committee. Then, again, there was the question whether the law could do anything towards discouraging the present excessive system of preservation. He thought, that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer could not give up his game duties, it was quite possible that those duties might be so arranged as to fall upon the preserving, rather than upon the killing of game. Then, again, it was to be considered whether the passing of the Act of last Session, combined with the Parochial Assessments Act, did not bring forward the subject of the rating game in a way which the House ought to consider. In the country there was a great deal of feeling about this rating question. They asked why land which went to the support of game should escape its due share of rating. Why, it was asked, should not woods be rated? Then, also, came the inquiry whether, when a right of shooting was let for a considerable sum, that also should not be assessed to the poor rate—whether it should not be rated in the same way as a farm? Again, according to the Parochial Assessment Act, the new valuations were often made on actual rent rather than on the intrinsic value of the land, and so it sometimes happened that A with 1,000 acres of land on which game was preserved paid on a rating of 15*s.* an acre only, while B with 1,000 acres on which game was not preserved paid on 20*s.* an acre. Yet A's land might be more productive than B's. Thus B paid a disproportionate amount of rating. The game, in fact, consumed the fruits of the land, and increased the demands on the rate, and yet was the only produce of the land which escaped being rated. Then he came to the way in which the game laws were administered. He did not wish to speak disrespectfully of the county magistrates—a body of men whose services to the country were inestimable, by whom justice was administered more equally than it would be by perhaps any other class, and of whom he had himself the honour to be one; but still even magistrates were men, they were not angels—and no doubt it was rather a difficult thing for a man who was himself a lover of sport, and who went to expense in the preservation of game, not to feel some degree of animus against a poacher. He was aware that a magistrate did not decide in his own case, but it was impossible that he should not be actuated by the feeling of his class. At any rate the idea that such an animus existed, was prevalent amongst the class from which the criminals came. Why should not a poacher be tried before a jury at quarter sessions? The reply would probably be that it would be an unkindness to the defendant to force him to find bail; but the choice might be given to him as by recent statute, in cases of petty larceny, to be tried by the magistrates if he preferred it, without a jury. Thus, at least, the impression of an unjust feeling would be removed. The last point to which he should advert was this:—They ought to look into the question whether the penalties against the Game Laws at the present moment were not higher than for other offences against property of equal value, and especially whether the revenue regulations were not used so as to increase these penalties. He was obliged to the House for the attention they had given him, although his opinions might be somewhat at variance with those of the majority. He hoped he had given reasons to induce them to grant this inquiry. He asked for that inquiry in order that such legislation might be attempted as would increase the comfort and improve the morals of the labouring population, get rid of the last remaining vestige of the old forest law, and promote concord between landlords, farmers, and labourers. Believing that it was the earnest desire of the House at all times to perpetuate this feeling, he begged to move for a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the Game Laws, and to report whether in their opinion any, and, if any, what alterations are required therein.

Mr. W. E. Forster

Mr. W. E. Forster

VISCOUNT ENFIELD, in seconding the Motion, said, that as he had supported the second reading of the Bill of last Session, but had not voted for the third reading, he might, perhaps, be allowed to recall the circumstances under which that measure was introduced. The Bill was read a second time on the 14th of July, and so strong was the opposition to it that thirty divisions took place before the measure became law. The promoters alleged that the crime of poaching had increased, that every winter murderous assaults occurred between gamekeepers and poachers; and they produced considerable effect upon the House by citing the opinion of the chief constables of different counties in the midland and northern districts, who stated that the crime of poaching had now assumed a somewhat new shape, and that whereas formerly it was the isolated act of individuals who were either actuated by a love of sport or were driven into it by distress, it was now the result of organized bands, who went out at night, and after sweeping the preserves, returned home with their spoil along the highway and despatched it from the next railway station; openly defying the constables who thus saw them go to the covers and saw them return with the result of their nocturnal depredations. Admitting these facts, it was argued on the other side that in a matter so important, involving so many difficult and delicate relations—those of landlord and tenant among the rest—it was impossible at so late a period of the year that justice could be done. They therefore asked for a postponement of legislation. Those who, like himself, had supported the second reading felt the difficulty; and when he saw the shape which the Bill assumed in Committee—its very title being changed—he felt that he could not vote for the third reading, and was anxious that a Committee should inquire into the subject. The parties affected by this question were the lovers of sport, the ratepayers, the farmers, the police, and, lastly, the general public; and it was in the interest of all those classes that he now supported the Motion. Neither this House nor the country wished, he believed, that this legitimate English pastime should be destroyed, but rather that such safeguards should be placed round it as would allay jealousy and ill-feeling. With regard to the ratepayers, they were of opinion that the police rates should not be devoted to keep up a body of men who might possibly be employed as amateur watchmen and gamekeepers. The farmers had a fair right to be considered in the question, and he was sure that the public, who complained of the inquisitorial provisions of the Bill, had a right to inquiry. If the inquiry were conceded, it would no doubt be conducted in the fair and impartial spirit which had characterized the speech of the hon. Member, and he earnestly hoped that the Committee asked for would be appointed.

Mr. W. E. Forster

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a Select Committee be appointed, to inquire into the operation of the Laws relating to Game, and to report whether in their opinion any, and if any what, alterations are required therein.”

MR. THOMPSON said, that if his hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Forster) had brought forward this Motion last Session, before the passing of the Act for the Prevention of Poaching, he should have heartily supported it; but to legislate first, and appoint a Committee of inquiry afterwards, was a proceeding so extraordinary that it was only to be justified by showing that the Act had produced mischievous results of such a character as called for immediate remedy. He had been neither surprised nor disappointed to find that his hon. Friend had brought forward no proofs of such mischief; and as his hon. Friend was far too acute a man not to see how much his case would have been strengthened if he could have adduced any proofs of the failure of the Act, it was safe to assume that none could be procured. On the other hand, very striking benefits had resulted from the passing of the Act, and of these he would give the House some idea by reading extracts from letters and returns furnished to him from his immediate neighbourhood by those who were best qualified to judge—the head constables and chiefs of the rural police. From York the chief constable wrote—

“Four regular poachers have abandoned poaching altogether, and the remaining known poachers pursue that calling less frequently. A B has given up poaching since the new Act came into operation, and is now earning his living by working as a labourer; C D is now working as a labourer; E F is earning his living as a smith; and G H as a joiner.”

From Knaresborough, which, though a very small town, had always been famous for its breed of poachers, the superintendent of police wrote—

“The Prevention of Poaching Act has materially lessened the depredations of poachers in this division. We have had five convictions under it, all police cases. Several notorious and professional poachers have abandoned their evil courses and taken to earning an honest living; others, seeing my determination to enforce the provisions of the Act, have left the neighbourhood.”

The inspector of police at Hull said—

“The Game Act of last Session has had considerable influence over the poachers in Hull. The greater part of the poachers who resorted to Hull came out of the country, particularly out of Lincolnshire, and only remained here a short time; these men are seldom seen now. Three men who reside in Hull, and were regular poachers, are now following other occupations—namely, A B, now working as an excavator at the enlarging of the Victoria Dock; C D, now employed at Messrs. —; and E F, working as a labourer on the dock-side.”

The head of the rural police in the North Riding said—

“My impression is that the Act, if properly and judiciously carried out by the police in accordance with the recent decision of the Court of Common Pleas, will answer its purpose, and materially prevent, if not entirely suppress, night poaching. I have received no complaint of any single constable having improperly exercised his powers under the Act. I think this important. It is most undesirable to make the police in any way game watchers, but they can carry out this Act in furtherance of their other duties, while watching roads and other places where thieves are expected to return home with their spoil.”

The next report was from the Skyrack division of the West Riding, furnished by the superintendent stationed at Leeds, who said—

“In this division there has been a decrease of persons apprehended and summoned since the passing of the Act. There are several men known to me who, previous to the passing of the Poaching Prevention Act, lived by poaching only, but are now partly working for a living. I do not think there has been sufficient time to test the operation of the Act, as the police had not sufficient power to interfere before the decision of Chief Justice Erle.”

The last was from the head of the rural police in the West Riding, who wrote—

“In those districts where poaching was most extensively practised the Act has worked well. Before Chief Justice Erle's decision there was so much uncertainty in the law that convictions were given with hesitation. Since that decision that hesitation has been removed, and the course is clear. The decision, however, was only given a short time since, but we all feel that the Act is likely to work well if it has time given to be tested. In the Doncaster and Knaresborough country, where poaching was much carried on, many men have given it up altogether, stating that the risk is now too great. The chief constables of Lincolnshire and Derbyshire, from whom I have heard on the subject, concur with me in the opinion that the Act will work as well as any Act can that is not very stringent and unpopular.”

That testimony was remarkably consistent and went far to show that the Act was working well—quite as well as its friends could have anticipated. But the Poaching Prevention Act bore date August 1862, only seven months ago, and a well-known decision in the Court of Common Pleas, which had added much to its efficiency, had been given on the 24th of January—not quite two months since; so that the law might be said to have been in full force only two months. If the Committee, which his hon. Friend moved for, were granted, its Members would be in this difficulty—that they must either take the results of this short trial as recognised facts to influence their Report, and perhaps to form the basis of future legislation; or, if they considered the time too short, and the results too recent to be trustworthy, they must throw over the latest legislation on the subject into which they were appointed to inquire, although aware that its working was most satisfactory. His hon. Friend had laid great stress upon the importance of the question whether game was to be made property or not. It was doubtless one of those important and difficult questions which must prominently occupy the attention of any Committee on the Game Laws, and the Act passed last Session had a very material bearing upon it, because for the first time it had placed game, at least partially, under the protection of the recognised guardians of the property of the public. The late Act, therefore, was, as it were, a great experiment to show whether the step which had been taken towards making game property went far enough, or ought to be carried further. The law respecting game was certainly, as his hon. Friend had remarked, in a very anomalous and doubtful state, as was well known to all county justices. The law recognised the possession of game, licensed the killing of game, and sanctioned its sale and purchase, but stopped short of making it property, and thus created a privileged class of plunderers, who, until the passing of the Act of last Session, could flaunt their ill-gotten booty in the very faces of the police with perfect impunity. It was not necessary for him to detain the House by pointing out the numerous evil consequences resulting from training up the police to ignore a particular class of transgressors, who, if that branch of their profession was overstocked, could turn their attention elsewhere. He trusted he had shown that the Act of last Session was working well, that a great experiment was being tried on a confessedly difficult subject for legislation, and that it would be premature to appoint a Committee of Inquiry. He wished to state distinctly that the Amendment, which he was about to propose, was not brought forward in order to defeat or elude inquiry, but to postpone it until a sufficient trial of the late Act had been made. He begged leave to move as an Amendment,

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the Game Laws, should be postponed until further experience shall have been obtained of the working of 'The Prevention of Poaching Act, 1862.'"

MR. PAULL rose to second the amendment. He had given notice on the first day of this Session of his intention to move for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Game Laws, and his reason was because he believed at the time that the result of the thirty divisions upon the Bill at the close of last Session was to render it nugatory. Had the Motion for inquiry been made last year, he should have had no hesitation in supporting it; but when, from the information which they had all recently received, it was found that the Act was working well, he thought it undesirable that the question should be re-opened before ample opportunity had been given of seeing whether the Bill was successful in its operation.

Mr. Thompson

Amendment proposed.

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the Game Laws, should be postponed until further experience shall have been obtained of the working of 'The Prevention of Poaching Act, 1862,'"

—instead thereof.

SIR GEORGE GREY: My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), in making his Motion, stated truly that during the discussions on the Game Bill, which came down from the House of Lords for our consideration at the end of last Session, I was asked whether I would assent to the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the operation of the Game Laws. I thought that at that period of the Session an inquiry could not be satisfactorily conducted; but I said that I should be willing to assent to the appointment of such a Committee in the ensuing Session in the event of any hon. Member bringing forward a Motion to that effect. In redemption of that pledge, I feel bound to support the Motion of my hon. Friend who has now moved the appointment of a Committee. When I look into the state of this question, and to what has taken place in both Houses of Parliament, I think that such an inquiry is not only not unreasonable, but that it is called for. In 1828, a Committee of the House of Lords was appointed to inquire into the operation of the Game Laws. That Committee went fully into the subject and made several important recommendations which, after an interval of two or three years, were made the subject of a Bill which was proposed by the late Lord Althorpe and which became law. That Act—the 1 & 2 Will. IV. c. 32, contains the substance of the law with regard to game, and with the addition of the Night Poaching Act, 9 Geo. IV., and the Act of last Session, constitutes the law on the subject, with the exception of those fiscal laws to which it is not necessary to advert, and which require the payment of a certain sum for certificates to kill, and for a licence to sell game. The results of the labours of the Committee of 1828 were, I think, most beneficial. They recommended several important modifications of the Game Laws as they had previously existed. First, they recommended that a property in game should be recognised by allowing it to be sold through licensed game-dealers. They also did away with the qualification previously required to kill game, and authorized any person, who had taken out a certificate, to kill game, subject only to the ordinary laws of trespass. The Night Poaching Act contained severe provisions—and very properly severe provisions—against persons going armed at night in pursuit of game. That Act has long been in operation, and many convictions, I am sorry to say, take place under it every year. Let us look at the facts of the case in connection with a most important point—its connection with crime. There is a fact which we cannot overlook, and which we ought to inquire into. The fact is, that a large proportion of the crime of the country is connected with the infringement of the Game Laws. Not only is a large proportion of the crime of the country connected with offences against the Game Law, but there has been a great and continuous increase in the amount of crime of this description. It is only since 1857 that we have had accurate statistics of crime laid before Parliament. I find that in that year there were of summary charges brought before magistrates for the infringement of the Game Laws 3,567, and of cases of night poaching and destroying game summarily dealt with, 1,883—making altogether, 5,534 summary charges for offences against the Game Laws. I find that in the year 1861—the last year for which we have complete Returns—that 8,563 cases were brought before magistrates for summary adjudication—that out of these there were no less than 7,007 convictions. Coming to 1862, the Returns for which are not before us, but which are in course of being prepared, the number of cases brought before magistrates for summary adjudication was 10,135. I am not able to state what number resulted in convictions; but here was an increase of from 5,534 in 1857 to 10,135 in 1862, cases brought summarily before magistrates for infringement of the Game Laws. This excludes altogether the most serious class of cases under the Night Poaching Act; under which persons are committed for trial at the assizes for various offences, for going about at night armed in pursuit of game, and for acts of violence connected with poaching. I think that is a state of matters which demands the serious consideration of the House. In 1841 a Committee of this House was moved for to inquire into the Game Laws. That Committee was granted, and one of the main reasons why the Government assented to that Committee was the connection which appeared to exist between crime and the Game Laws. I must say that that reason is stronger now than it was then. I am bound to say also that I think that this increase of crime is in some degree owing to the great increase of game and to the excessive preservation of it, though I entirely agree with those who are in favour of a reasonable preservation of game with a view to that legitimate sport which it is desirable to encourage, and which no man, I think, wishes to destroy. The hon. Gentleman who seconded the Amendment (Mr. Paul) took the earliest opportunity this Session of giving notice that he would introduce a Bill to make game property. That is an idea which has been gaining ground of late. There is a good deal to be said in favour of it; but considering the state of the law, the decisions of courts of law, and the many questions which must be weighed before any Act can be passed making game property, I think that a careful inquiry ought to be made into the subject. I understood that the hon. Gentleman, as soon as notice of this Motion for the appointment of a Committee was given, withdrew his notice of the Bill. The law, as it at present stands, is certainly in a most anomalous state. It is understood to rest on a dictum of Lord Coke, that where game started on one property is killed upon it, it belongs to the owner of that property; but that if it passes over the boundary of that property and goes into another property, and is there killed, it belongs to the person by whom it is killed. I think there are ample grounds for inquiring into the state of the law before we assent to the proposal made by the hon. Gentleman that game should be made property. The only reason urged against the proposed inquiry is that the Act passed last Session, which it is said will be a cure for all the evils complained of, has been only a short time in operation. I cannot think that is a sufficient reason for negativing the Motion of my hon. Friend. If it was desirable last Session that an inquiry should take place into the existing Game Laws. I think it is more desirable now. It is important that we should have one general view of what the operation of the Act of last Session has been throughout the country. The facts stated by the hon. Member who moved the Amendment will be laid before the Committee, and they will form a part of this general view of the operation of that Act. I have the satisfaction of knowing that the opposition I gave to that Bill, in conjunction with many others, led to essential modifications of it; that that opposition removed most objectionable provisions in it, and especially that arbitrary and unconstitutional power by which an individual policeman could confine a person for an indefinite time and upon mere suspicion. I believe that the Act as it passed this House was calculated in many cases to be a useful Act; but I believe, at the same time, that it has not succeeded in accomplishing the great object of its promoters—namely, the breaking-up of the gangs of poachers which, especially in Cheshire and in other parts of the north, go out armed at night and carry on poaching upon a scale which makes it impossible for the police to interfere with them except at great risk of life. The amount of crime arising from the Game Laws is most unequally distributed. We find there are counties, such as Cheshire, in which the crime abounds; while there are counties, such as Warwickshire, not differing essentially in the character of its population, in which during the time over which the Return moved for last Session extends there has been only one case of serious assault arising from poaching. I think the House ought to consider what are the causes of this crime being so frequent in some counties while in other counties the crime scarcely exists. I willingly assent to the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the Game Laws in redemption of the pledge that I gave last Session. Before I sit down, I wish to say that I think the decision of one of the courts of law upon the construction of the Act of last Session has been misapprehended by some hon. Gentlemen who have taken part in this discussion. The case referred to came, I believe, before the Court of Common Pleas, and it was this:—Some poachers had been apprehended on a high road, fresh blood and feathers were on their nets, and it was evident that they had just come off some land in pursuit of game. The decision of the court was not, as I understood it, that the onus probandi in every case was to be thrown upon a person in the possession of game on a highway, but that it was for the magistrates to determine whether the circumstances given in evidence were such as to lead them to believe that the terms of the Act applied to the persons brought before them. It is a misapprehension, therefore, to suppose that the police are about to assume some new power in consequence of the decision of the Court. Last Session I promised that I would support a Motion for a Committee of Inquiry, and in fulfilment of that pledge I shall vote for the Motion of the hon. Member.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, as the House had been informed by the right hon. Baronet that Warwickshire was free from the crime of poaching, they might be surprised at his having taken an active part in procuring an alteration of the Game Law last Session. He did so because information came to him from Warwickshire that gangs were being formed in Birmingham and other large towns, and he was anxious to check their formation. He thought it would not become the dignity of the House to enter upon an inquiry before the Act of last Session had had a fair trial. He would warn hon. Gentlemen that there had been an under-current agitation, and that many were the delusions which had been propagated among the farming classes on the subject. The supporters of the Act of last Session had been untruly represented to be exclusively in favour of large preservers. That no doubt was the character of the Bill when it came down from the House of Lords, but it underwent an alteration. He hoped that in vindication of the law of last Session the House would refuse an inquiry.

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL suggested, that as there was a licence to kill game, and a licence to sell game, there should also be a licence to preserve game. [The noble Lord spoke amid loud and continuous cries for a Division.]

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 157; Noes 176: Majority 19.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Sir George Grey

Resolved,

That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the Game Laws, should be postponed until further experience shall have been obtained of the working of "The Prevention of Poaching Act, 1862."

COLLEGE OF ARMS—CHANGE OF NAMES—GRANTS OF ARMS.

RETURNS MOVED FOR.

MR. ROEBUCK, who had given notice to move an—

"Address for Returns of the names and titles of the various Officers of the College of Arms in England, Scotland, and Ireland :

"Of the duties which are performed by such Officers separately and together :

"Of the names of persons who have applied for grants of Arms or privilege to make changes in their existing Arms since 1850 ; stating the cases in which such applications have been granted or refused, together with the reasons assigned for such refusal :

"Of the fees which have been demanded upon making the grants and conferring the powers applied for :

"And, of all the emoluments of the said Officers, specifying the sources from which they emanate :"

Also, for an—

"Address for Returns of the names of all persons who have applied for Licences to change their names since 1810 :

"Of the instances in which such Licences have been granted during that period, together with a Statement of the names of the successful applicants, and of the names which they have been permitted to assume by Royal Licence :

"Of the names of the persons so applying who have been refused during the same period, with the reasons assigned in each case for the refusal :

"Of the principles by which the Home Office is guided in granting and refusing such Licences :

"And, of the amount of Fees demanded for such Licences since 1810, and the manner in which the monies received have been applied."

said, the reason which had induced him to make this Motion was as much as possible to put an end to official tyranny. He wanted persons in office to know that they had nothing to do with the law but obey it. They did not make the law ; and when the law was clear, it was their bounden duty to place no obstacles in the way of carrying it out in any way, out of spite, malevolence, and vulgar malice. Now, the first thing he would do was to state clearly what was the law upon the subject, and he would then ask the House to agree with him that it was a matter of importance that the law should be fairly carried out, and not be abused for the gratification of individual spite. He had hoped that the Attorney General would have been present that evening, because he wanted to make the statement in his hearing, and see whether the hon. and learned Gentleman would gainsay it. He asserted broadly this to be the law—that any man had a right to take any name he pleased, upon any occasion he pleased, and for any reason he pleased, excepting fraud. For that purpose he required no licence whatever ; no Act of Parliament was needed. The Queen could give him licence to walk the streets, but he had power without the licence. So any man might take any name he pleased, and the Queen's licence gave him no power in addition to his own will. That was the law ; and to make the matter clear, he would read a few sentences from a book of Mr. Falconer, who was now a Judge in Wales, which really contained all the law upon the subject—

"That in the year 1735, when the question of the manner in which surnames could be changed was before the House of Lords, no notice was taken of any supposed privilege of the Crown to grant licences on such occasions. 2. That any person may take any surname, and that the law recognises the new name when assumed publicly and bonâ fide. (Chief Justice Tindall, Lord Stowell, &c.) 3. That a man may assume what surname and as many surnames as he pleases. (Sir Joseph Jekyll, M.R.) 4. That where both Christian and surname have been changed, the law will recognise the assumed names. (Lord Ellenborough and the Court of King's Bench.) 5. That no Act of Parliament or Royal Licence is needed in order to sanction a change of name, unless a new name is directed by a donor of land or money, to be assumed by the donee, with such or some other particular sanction, and subject to the forfeiture of the donation if the name should not be assumed in the manner directed by the terms of such conditional donation. (Lord Chief Justice Tenterden and the Court of King's Bench.) 6. That when a name is assumed by Royal Licence, it is so assumed by the act of the person taking the name, and the name is not conferred by the licence. (Lord Chancellor Eldon.) 7. That the effect of a Royal Licence is merely to give publicity or notoriety to the change of name. (Chief Justice Tindal.) 8. That when, by any Act of Parliament, judges have the control of a particular roll of names, they will, on a change of name, when the change is publicly and bonâ fide made, direct the new name to be added to the roll, though such name has been assumed without a Royal Licence, and by the mere act of the person whose name is on the roll. (Court of Exchequer, &c.) 9. That when any person has legally assumed a name by his own act, it is compulsory on courts of law to recognise the legal act. ('The King v. the Inhabitants of Billinghamst,' and 'Luscombe v. Yates.')

If that were the law, he wanted the House to determine that no official person whatever should interfere or interrupt the operation of the law ; and his reason for bringing the notice before the House was because official power had been brought to bear against a person holding a commission as justice of the peace to obstruct him in carrying out the law. Some years since there was a gentleman who died in Wales named Jones. He had three sons; but this notice had only to do with two of them. The eldest became Mr. Jones of Llanarth, and the younger Mr. Jones of Clytha. Mr. Jones of Llanarth had a son, and then died. The son determined to marry. He was sorry to have to mention the name of a lady—but the son of Mr. Jones, of Llanarth, wanted to marry a daughter of Sir Benjamin Hall, and he thought he would take on himself the name of Herbert, to which he believed by succession he had a right. He got a Royal licence to make that change of name. He married the lady, and became Mr. Herbert, of Llanarth. The second son, Mr. Jones of Clytha, also had sons, but he was still living. One of the sons wished to become a Volunteer. The father, however, wished him not to become a Volunteer until he came of age; and then the father determined, as his nephew also had done, to take the name of Herbert, to which he had as much right as his nephew, because, being of the same family, if one had the right, so had the other. He determined to take the name of Herbert. Here it was necessary to bring in the name of Lord Llanover. Lord Llanover was Lord Lieutenant of that county; and when apprised of the fact that the uncle of his son-in-law had taken the name of Herbert, he told the young gentleman, the son of Mr. Jones of Clytha, that he could not permit him to take that name or to be a Volunteer under that name. And then Lord Llanover stood up very violently for what he called the Queen's prerogative—which was a curious operation to be performed by Lord Llanover, when they considered his antecedents. There was an old proverb which he thought applied to this process, but he would not mention it. However, Lord Llanover chose to take on himself this quarrel, and he determined not only to prevent the young gentleman from being a Volunteer, but there were very suspicious articles constantly printed in the Welsh papers, doing all they could to cast a slur on Mr. Jones of Clytha, because he had taken the name of Herbert without a Royal licence. The real facts were these. An application was made, he believed, personally to gentlemen connected with the Herald's Office. Mr.

Mr. Roebuck

Jones of Clytha said, "I suppose there will be no difficulty in a change of name?" "Oh, yes, but there will," was the reply. "My nephew changed his name." "Yes, but that was through the interest of Lord Llanover;" and then Mr. Jones learned the law, that he could take the name without a licence, and he took the name of Herbert. First, he wished to impress on the House that it was the law that a man might take any name for any reason, so long as it was not a fraud; and as he was told that people had paid large sums of money for changes of name, he wanted further to tell people from his place in Parliament that they need not pay one farthing to any body for such a purpose. But it might be said, that is a very mischievous law. His answer was, that he could not help it. It was the law, and he wanted any one, in the face of the world and in the face of the legal profession, to say that it was not. Let any one deny it if they could, and let the Herald's Office lament its notoriety. Hereafter great good, instead of great harm, would follow from the greater knowledge of that fact. Names had been taken in large numbers. Numbers of people who had risen from low stage of society had changed their names, and, historically speaking, it was only quite lately that surnames as surnames had been had at all. He had known a man indicted in Yorkshire as John O'Stile, because from living near a stile that surname was given to him. It might often occur that a man had some peculiarity, such as a squint, and might in consequence be called John-with-a-Squint. From that circumstance the children might receive the name of Squint. Some people's names were most offensive. Only let hon. Members imagine a nice young lady coming into a room and being announced as Miss Shufflebottom. It had been sarcastically said, that the names of Tudor, Plantagenet, Stuart, and other great names, were only assumed by fifth-rate actors and inferior Members of the House of Lords. That was a mistake, for very important Members of the House of Lords—men of great title—had taken, what he should call, very ridiculous names. The great and historic name of Seymour had, for some idle purpose or other, been changed into the sort of pantomime name of St. Maur. Another name, borne by a great man, had been changed, and for good reason. The Duke of Wellington's name was Wesley, but that noble Duke changed his name in India, without any Royal licence, into the better-looking and better-sounding name of Wellesley; and the change was sanctioned immediately by the Horse Guards, and the name of Arthur Wellesley appeared in the next Army List. Similar liberty to change a name had not been given by the War Office in a recent case. A gentleman named Jones became an officer, and wished to change his name. His father, whose name was Paul, assumed the name of St. Paul, and the son wanted to do the same; but the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War refused, it was said, to consent to the change of name. Now, that man had a right, if he chose, to change his name, and all that the right hon. Gentleman had to do was to obey the law, and cause the required alteration to be made in the Army List. What he had asked for was a Return of the names of all persons who had applied for licences to change their names since 1810, but the right hon. Gentleman had told him that the records had been so kept, that there were no records so far back as that. This being so, he would say since 1850, instead of 1810, but he wanted to know why he should not also have a Return of the names of all persons who had applied for licences to change their names since 1810. The right hon. Gentleman had told him that such a Return would give pain; but if persons desired to change their names, and it was afterwards required for public purposes to know what names had been changed, he could not help pain being given to accomplish that public purpose. The next Return which he wanted was as to the instances in which such licences had been granted since 1850, together with the names of the successful applicants; and further, a return of the names of persons who, having applied for permission, had received a refusal, with the reasons assigned. It was quite true that the Queen might refuse a licence if she pleased; but he wanted to know what was the rule that was acted upon; but though the Queen's name was used, of course it was not Her Majesty, but the right hon. Gentleman, or rather his officers, who acted in the matter. Then he wanted to know the principle by which the Home Office was guided in granting or refusing licences; and if the right hon. Gentleman claimed to have the power to refuse a licence, it was quite right that they should know upon what principle this was done. He also wanted to ascertain whether it was mere whim, or an idle desire on his part to retain power in his hands, which had led to the course which had been pursued; and, in addition, he wanted to know what amount of fees had been demanded for such licences, and the manner in which the money received had been applied. His only objects were to prevent the operation of spite and vulgar malice, and to have the law strictly applied without favour.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, a Return of the names of all persons who have applied for Licences to change their names since 1850."

COLONEL CLIFFORD said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman who had made the Motion (Mr. Roebuck) had done an injustice to Lord Llanover, who for thirty years had occupied a seat in that House, and who was still known to a large majority of the Members, and, he was sure he should be borne out in saying, had so conducted himself on all occasions as to secure their esteem. The House would feel how unlikely it was that such a man would have conducted himself with unnecessary hostility towards any person, or have acted from "spite and vulgar malice"—to use the words of the hon. and learned Gentleman. He (Colonel Clifford) was aware of all the facts of the case referred to, and no one had regretted more than he did what had taken place, nor, he might add, had done more to bring it to a termination satisfactory to all parties. He felt bound to say that so far from Lord Llanover having refused the commission in question in consequence of the change of name, as had been asserted, he (Colonel Clifford) knew of his own personal knowledge that the commission had been offered and accepted before the change of name had taken place, and before it was even known that such a change was in contemplation. The Lord Lieutenant allowed the commission to stand over until Mr. Jones came of age, at his request; but his Lordship was not aware that the object of the delay was to effect a change in the name. On his becoming of age Mr. Herbert wrote, not to the Lord Lieutenant, but to the Clerk of the Peace in the county, requesting to be gazetted by the name of Herbert instead of Jones. That was the first notice which was given on the subject, although afterwards an advertisement announcing the change of name was published. The hon. and learned Gentleman might say that the Lord Lieutenant entertained an exaggerated conception of the Royal prerogative. He would not go into that question, but would say only that in his firm belief the Lord Lieutenant was actuated solely by his conviction as to his duty in regard to that prerogative, and not by any private spite or malice. The noble Lord was extremely desirous to give Mr. Herbert, of Clytha, a commission, and was willing to have put him on the commission of the peace. Surely these facts were inconsistent with his alleged hostility. He could state, also, that Mr. Herbert, of Llanarth, had expressed a strong desire that every member of his family, and especially his uncle, should bear the name of Herbert, as well as himself; and he never heard a syllable from Lord Llanover to a contrary effect. All his Lordship sought was that Mr. Herbert, of Clytha, in changing his name, should respect the usual forms of procedure. At a recent Volunteer dinner a wish was expressed that Mr. Reginald Herbert should accept a vacant commission in the corps; but in returning thanks for the toast of his health Mr. Reginald Herbert said it was impossible for him to accept the offer, as he was certain the Lord Lieutenant would not grant him the commission. Now, he could assure the House that at that very time Lord Llanover had no unwillingness to grant it, and has nominated Mr. R. Herbert to the vacant post unasked by him, because he knew it was the wish of the corps. This certainly was then unknown to Mr. Herbert. That showed there were no unworthy personal feelings on the part of the noble Lord in this matter, and that his conduct had been guided by what he believed to be his duty only.

SIR GEORGE GREY: I do not wish to enter into the personal question, which has been rather unnecessarily brought before the House by my hon. and learned Friend. I will only say that when the hon. and learned Gentleman charges me with having arbitrarily refused applications for leave to make a change of name, I do not know to what cases he refers. I will merely state the principle by which I have been guided in granting or refusing these licences. In the present instance Mr. Jones, of Llanarth, applied some years ago for the Royal licence to change his name to Herbert, on the ground of descent from an ancestor of that name. The representatives of several noble families of the name having been communicated with by the applicant for the licence, who stated that they concurred in the proposal, the Royal licence was granted, and Mr. Jones, thus authorized, assumed the name of Herbert. It is stated that Mr. Jones of Clytha is equally entitled to change his name; but there is this difference, that he never applied for the Royal licence. If he had made the application, and supported it on precisely the same grounds as Mr. Jones of Llanarth, and if I had refused it, then the hon. and learned Gentleman would have had some cause to complain of my arbitrary conduct; but, as I was never applied to, and consequently never refused, his charge falls to the ground. The hon. and learned Gentleman also referred to the case of a distinguished officer, Sir J. Jones, an officer who served with great distinction in India, who desired to change his name. I lately received an application from that gentleman, requesting me to direct the Commander-in-Chief to alter his name in the Army List from Jones to St. Paul; but it was clearly quite beyond my power to give any such direction. The hon. and learned Gentleman says, there is no doubt that any person may assume any name he chooses without Royal licence. Now, I am not going to dispute the legal position he maintains. I believe there is no legal right to a name—any person may take any name he pleases; but then it does not follow that everybody else must at once consent to recognise him by that name. It is by no means a matter of course, because a gentleman who has hitherto been known as Jones suddenly calls himself Herbert, or any other name that whom may dictate, that all the world must immediately acquiesce in the alteration. In short, this is rather a question of fact than of law. A man's name is that by which he is generally known. How he may have acquired it does not matter. It is his name, and he has a right to be called by it if it is the name which he usually receives among his friends and acquaintances. I am not aware of any case in which the civil and military authorities have refused to recognise a man by the name by which he is habitually known. As to the case of Sir John Jones, I certainly had no authority to interfere.

Colonel Clifford

MR. ROEBUCK: No, I did not refer to the right hon. Gentleman, but to his Colleague the Secretary for War.

SIR GEORGE GREY: When an application is made to a Lord Lieutenant to sanction a change of name, it is only natural he should inquire what grounds there are for the change. There must be something like usage to support the claim, or the greatest confusion would be introduced into society. For instance, in the case of wills, the question of identity might be raised. There might be some doubt as to who was the person referred to by a testator, and it would become an important inquiry how he was usually designated. As to the Returns for which the hon. and learned Gentleman has moved, I think it would be wrong to give the names of all the persons who have applied for leave to change their names, and whose applications have been granted or refused. As to the principles by which the Home Office has been guided in dealing with these applications, I have to inform my hon. and learned Friend that there is no written document on the subject. About 200 years ago the practice of applying for the Royal licence to change names arose, and in 1783, in consequence of the frequency of those requests, it was deemed necessary to put some check on them. A regulation was therefore made, that all applications should be referred to the College of Arms. That reference is not, however, necessarily decisive, as it is intended only for the information of the Secretary of State. That usage has been universally adopted, subject to the modification introduced by the late Sir Robert Peel, that where there are no plausible grounds for an application, and it is obviously the mere result of whim or caprice, it should be at once declined, without any reference to the College of Arms, leaving it to the applicant to exercise the right, which the hon. and learned Gentleman said all possessed, of changing his name on his own responsibility. Among others, illegitimate sons have frequently applied for leave to adopt the name of their putative fathers with their consent, and often in consideration of a provision made for them. Is it desirable that all these cases should be dragged before the public? Pain, I know, as the hon. Gentleman says, must sometimes be inflicted on individuals where a great public object is to be attained, but what important end is to be gained by publishing these names? There are cases in which a bequest or legacy has been coupled with a condition that the legatee or devisee should assume a particular name, and in these cases the Royal licence is granted. There could be no objection to give these names, but I do not think it is worth while to make any exceptions. I have no objection to give Returns of the number of applications which have been made and of the number which have been acceded to, the difference between the numbers being of course those rejected. I am also ready to give every information as to the fees, which are paid over to the fee fund. I hope my hon. and learned Friend will not press for further details, but will be content to accept the Returns in this modified form.

MR. ROEBUCK said, the right hon. Gentleman had only reiterated what he stated some time ago when this question was first brought forward—namely, that it was all a matter of usage. He (Mr. Roebuck) was glad to see the Solicitor General present, because he hoped to get from him some explanation of the word usage. When did usage begin? He would mention a case how the Law Courts treated this question. Some time ago Dr. Pye Smith ("Pye" being a Christian name), an eminent divine, died, leaving two sons, one of whom was on the roll of attorneys. After his death it was represented to his sons that it would be a mark of respect to their father if they assumed the Christian name of Pye as their surname, and accordingly the gentleman who was on the roll of attorneys applied to the Courts, and they at once acknowledged his right to do so, and made the requisite alteration on the roll of attorneys. What, then, became of the right hon. Gentleman's statement that the right to be known by a change of name was matter of usage? He asserted, on the contrary, that the question was one of law and not of fact, and that every person in office was bound to take official cognizance of a bond fide change of name. He wished to have the names of those who had applied for the Royal licence, not from a desire to give pain, but because he wanted to know the reasons that had guided the Home Secretary in granting or refusing the desired permission. The Home Secretary said he could give no rule; but was the right hon. Gentleman sure that written rules had not lately been drawn up by the official person who guided the Home Office in these matters? He was told that there were such rules; and if so the right hon. Gentleman could give them, and they could be examined. If that were done, the prevailing impression that a certain influence and power were necessary to obtain the Royal licence would be removed. He was obliged to accede to the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion, but the mischief would remain until some other Lord Llanover, full of the Queen's prerogative, although he came from Marylebone, desired to put himself forward as a great man newly made.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the discussion was very interesting, but was not of very great importance to the country at large. At the risk of appearing to his hon. and learned Friend to err in his law, he must say that to the best of his belief there was no positive law on this subject. The fact was, that surnames grew up mostly as nicknames, of which the hon. and learned Member had given an amusing example. Their very origin showed that there was no positive law on the subject. It was a matter of usage and reputation from the beginning; the name clung to a man, and the law permitted him to shuffle it off if he could. There was no law forbidding a man to change his name; but there was also no law which compelled his neighbour to acknowledge him under the name he might assume. It reminded him of the saying of Owen Glendower—

"I can call spirits from the vasty deep."

Hotspur rejoins—

"Why so can I, or so can any man;

"But will they come when you do call for them?"

It was exactly the same with these names. Everybody was at liberty, if he pleased, to change his surname, but no one else was obliged to recognise the change unless he pleased. It was said, by the Judge who decided one of the cases on the subject, that a man might assume a new name, and "work his way with it in the world as well as he could." When, however, by usage, a man had acquired a name by reputation, then persons in public authority were practically obliged to acknowledge the new surname. His hon. and learned Friend had spoken as if the courts of law were obliged to comply with the request of an attorney who might wish to change his name. In the cases mentioned by his hon. and learned Friend, the court, seeing nothing to the contrary, and being told by the attorney that he intended to use his new surname in future, thought it right—as the man would probably put his name on a brass-plate on his door and be professionally known by his new name—to grant the application; but in granting the very last application of this kind Lord Chief Justice Cockburn expressly guarded himself against laying down the rule that any man had a legal right to call upon the court to alter his name on the rolls. He said the court did it for convenience. There was no law on the subject; but when there appeared to be nothing arbitrary or improper, and when there was no encroachment on the feelings or rights of others, then it was courteous to accede to the wish of a person who might desire to change his name. There was, however, no principle of law that any person occupying an official position, was bound to recognise a capricious or arbitrary assumption of names by persons who had no right to them either by descent or by the inheritance of property.

Mr. Roebuck

Motion, by leave, withdrawn :—Then,

Address for

"Returns of the number of applications for Royal Licence for a change of Name since 1850 :"

"Of the number of Licences granted since the same date :"

"Of the amount of Fees payable on the grant of the licence :"

"And, of the manner in which the Fees were applied :"—And,

Address for

"Return of the number of applications for Grants of Arms, or for power to change existing Arms, since 1850; the number of such applications complied with, and the amount of Fees payable thereon," —agreed to.

THAMES EMBANKMENT (SOUTH SIDE) BILL.—LEAVE—FIRST READING.

MR. COWPER, in moving for leave to introduce a Bill to enable the Metropolitan Board of Works to embank that portion of the River Thames opposite the Houses of Parliament extending between Westminster Bridge and the Gasworks near Vauxhall on the south side of the River, said, that all who desired the improvement of the metropolis, and the making of convenient thoroughfares, would naturally consider that one of the first objects to be dealt with was the river. The Thames was the great feature of London, and to its situation on the tidal waters of the Thames London owed its origin, its commercial prosperity, and its pretensions to be not only the metropolis of the British Empire, but the capital of the world. Although the river had been adequately used for the purposes of commerce, it had been greatly neglected in other respects. We had allowed it to become the receptacle of the offscourings and refuse of the town, and had allowed its mud-banks to become festering heaps when the tide was low, and to disseminate far and wide the most injurious gases. A large portion of its banks had been allowed to be monopolized by private parties, who had erected different places of business, and excluded the public from all access to the river. On the Middlesex side it was true that a mile and a half of embankment existed between Chelsea Bridge and the Houses of Parliament, and by the Act of last Session another embankment of a mile and a half in length was to be made between Westminster and Blackfriars Bridges. On the south side of the river, however, the only portion which could be properly called an embankment, and to which the public had access, was that small part called Bank-side, and that small space near Lambeth Palace called the Bishop's Walk. He believed that both of these were portions of an ancient embankment, and that the present course of the river had been influenced by the embankment erected in the earliest times—the times of the Saxons—in order to prevent the water of the Thames from flowing over the low lands, and especially over that part called Lambeth Marsh, which it seemed was formerly entirely covered by the water of the Thames at high tides. However, the water was not entirely kept back by the embankment, for at the present moment at very high tides the water of the Thames flowed over the embankment and entered the lower floors of the houses in many of the streets, to the great inconvenience and misery of the inhabitants, and adding greatly to the diseases which were too often rife in the neighbourhood. There could be no doubt that an embankment of that portion of the Lambeth side of the river was urgently required, and he proposed to embank that part of the right bank which lay between Westminster Bridge and the gas works, and to carry a thoroughfare along the embankment to Vauxhall, and to the Nine Elms station. He would thus provide a convenient communication and a place of recreation where people might breathe the fresh air of the river, and enjoy a view of the Abbey and the Houses of Parliament. It was proposed by the Bill to widen the river at Millbank, which was at present the narrowest part, by which the flow and reflux of the tide would be greatly facilitated. It was also proposed to remove a portion of the mud-banks, which at present occasioned much annoyance and a considerable amount of disease in the neighbourhood. The effect of this would be to reduce the disease which prevailed in a very unhealthy district, and at the same time to remove a large number of noxious manufactories, the effluvia from which extended over the neighbourhood. The Bill proposed to empower the Metropolitan Board of Works to purchase the land required for the embankment and to execute the works, defraying the cost out of the Thames Embankment Fund. The Bill enabled them to raise money upon the security of that fund, but the charge for the southern embankment was to be made second to the charges which had already been put upon the fund, so that the embankment on the north side, between Westminster Bridge and Blackfriars, and the street between Blackfriars and the Mansion House, would have a prior claim. The Bill did not contain any provision for raising funds or imposing taxes, but simply gave the Metropolitan Board of Works the power of spending money which had been allotted to metropolitan improvements. Perhaps it would be said that the whole of the southern side of the Thames ought to be embanked; nor could he deny that it would be a great improvement. But it would involve so large an expenditure of money, and be such an interference with the trade and commerce of London, that he did not think that such a measure was practicable under the present circumstances. What was proposed by the present Bill was certainly the most urgent; and if at a future time it was thought desirable to extend the embankment either above or below the points to which it would be carried by the present Bill, a further measure might be introduced. There could be no doubt that a portion of the Surrey side required improvement both for the health and for the convenience of the inhabitants. The Bill was founded on a recommendation of the Royal Commission. Some modifications had been introduced, but in the main it was founded on the evidence and the Report of that Commission, and he trusted it would receive the sanction of the House.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he was very sorry to hear that there was no intention on the part of the Government to bring in a measure to embank the whole of the south side. Within the last week or ten days there had been very great inundations on the Lambeth side of the river. Many streets had been flooded, and the cellars of hundreds of houses had been deluged and great damage done to valuable property; yet the right hon. Gentleman evaded dealing with more than a small portion of the embankment. Nothing short of an embankment all the way down to Blackfriars Bridge, if not further, would do justice to the Surrey side. The right hon. Gentleman said the funds which were proposed to be raised for the purpose of metropolitan improvements were to be devoted in the first instance to the improvement of the north side of the river. Did not that mean, that if the improvements on the north side of the river absorbed the whole of the sums provided, the embankment on the south side would have to take its chance, and there was no knowing when it would be completed? In his opinion, the works on both sides ought to go on simultaneously. He was quite sure that the present Bill would be totally ineffective to remedy much of the damage that the inhabitants of Lambeth complained of.

MR. W. CUBITT said, that the embankment on the north side of the Thames was not intended to meet the convenience of the inhabitants of the river-bank; but it being absolutely necessary to provide some means for carrying the increasing traffic through the City, the Commission was appointed which recommended the embankment of the north side of the river; and this was more especially necessary when it was remembered, that if they did not adopt such a course, the Metropolitan Commissioners of Works would have to lay down a large sewer through the Strand and Fleet Street. There was no great necessity for a new line of traffic on the south side; nor could that side of the river be embanked without interfering with large manufactories carried on alike for the benefit of the owners and the public. He contended, that if persons owned wharfs on the side of the river, it was their duty to see that the walls were carried sufficiently high to prevent the water overflowing; but he denied the fact that, with the exception of that part to be now dealt, with the water did overflow on the south side. He could state from personal observation that between Blackfriars Bridge and Westminster Bridge no inconvenience was suffered from flooding. He agreed that it was necessary that there should be an embankment on the south side between Westminster and Vauxhall Bridges, which were frequently over-flooded, and that the public money would be properly expended in carrying out such a work; but he denied that they would be justified in applying the public money to embanking the Thames on the south side east of Westminster Bridge.

Mr. W. Williams

Motion agreed to.

Bill for the Embankment of part of the River Thames on the South side thereof, in the parish of Saint Mary Lambeth; and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. COWPER and Mr. PERL.

Bill presented, and read 1^o; and referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills; and to be printed. [Bill 65.]

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS BILL.

[BILL 22.] THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved the third reading of this Bill.

MR. HUBBARD said, this measure consisted of two distinct parts. To the first part, which provided for the transfer of funds from one set of savings banks to another, he saw no objection; but the second was hardly consonant with the title of the Bill, and called for some remark. It related to the conversion of a portion of the permanent debt of the country into terminable annuities. This opened up an entirely new question. He had no objection to the selection of the 2½ per cent stock with terminable annuities as the security, in which these funds should be invested; but that was not the present proposition. The present proposition, while it had the ultimate effect of extinguishing a part of the national debt, for a time increased the annual sum chargeable on the Consolidated Fund, and which had to be provided by the taxation of the public. Thus the latter clauses of this measure had an immediate and important bearing on the amount of the burdens to be imposed on the people. It was, of course, a most proper thing to pay off the public debt; but he objected to the House being asked, hoodwinked, to do an act practically adding to the taxation of the country. Clauses, dealing with the conversion of perpetual into terminable annuities, ought to form the subject of a specific measure, instead of being made supplementary to provisions touching Post Office savings banks, with which they had no necessary connection.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, his hon. Friend, as he understood him, objected to the structure of this measure because it combined certain clauses relating to the regulation of Post Office savings banks, with certain other clauses referring to the investment of the monies of depositors. Now, in regard to what were called the old savings banks, it had been customary to separate legislation on the subject of finance from legislation on the subject of management; but the necessity for that separation did not lie in any natural incongruity between those two subjects, but arose because there were other parties independent of the Government, who had a great interest in the management of the savings banks, but who, on the other hand, had nothing to do with matters of public finance. But in the case of the Post Office savings banks, where, when once the security of the depositors was provided for, the whole affair was the affair of the public, there was no reason for separating that which related to management from that which related to finance. No doubt, when they proceeded to convert 3 or 3½ per cent stocks into terminable annuities, they increased the annual charge on the public for a time, in order by-and-by to get rid of it altogether; and his hon. Friend's objection was, that that being a distinct object in itself, ought to have been proposed with more Parliamentary form and pomp. That was not necessary, because this measure did not propose the introduction of a new principle, but only the extension of an old one. In the Old Jewry, at the office of the Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt, the Government had what might be called a shop where terminable annuities were daily bought and sold.

Bill read 3^o and passed.

THAMES EMBANKMENT (NORTH SIDE) BILL.

Select Committee on the Thames Embankment (North Side) Bill nominated :—Mr. COWPER, Mr. WILLIAM CUBITT, Mr. BRAMSTON, Mr. TITE, Mr. WESTERN WOOD, Mr. AYRTON, and Five Members to be nominated by the Committee of Selection :—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

STATUTE LABOUR ROADS AND BRIDGES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Sir John Ogilvy, Bill to amend the Law with respect to Statute Labour Roads and Bridges in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Sir JOHN OGILVY, Sir JAMES FERGUSON, Sir ANDREW AGNEW, and Mr. WILLIAM LESLIE. Bill presented, and read 1^o. [Bill 63.]

STATUTE LABOUR ROADS AND BRIDGES (SCOTLAND) TRANSFER BILL.

On Motion of Sir John Ogilvy, Bill to provide for the Transfer of the management of the Statute Labour Roads and Bridges within burghs in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Sir JOHN OGILVY and Mr. KINNAIRD.

Bill presented, and read 1^o. [Bill 64.]

SALE OF GAS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Bruce, Bill for amending the Act for regulating Measures used in Sales of Gas, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BRUCE and Sir GEORGE GREY.

Bill presented, and read 1^o. [Bill 61.]

WRITS PROHIBITION (No. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. E. P. Bouverie, Bill to prohibit the issue of Writs for Actions of Debt in the Superior Courts for sums of less than twenty pounds, ordered to be brought in by Mr. EDWARD PLEYDELL BOUVÉRIE and Mr. HARDCASTLE.

Bill presented, and read 1^o. [Bill 62.]

House adjourned at a quarter after Eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, March 18, 1863.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Thames Embankment—Mr. Western Wood discharged; Mr. Crawford added.

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Diseases Prevention (Metropolis) [Bill 41], after debate, deferred.

Considered as amended—Hares (Ireland) [Bill 51]. Third Reading—Consolidated Fund (£10,000,000) and passed.

DISEASES PREVENTION (METROPOLIS) BILL.—[Bill 41.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BRADY, having presented several petitions in favour of this Bill, moved that the Bill be now read a second time. The principle of the measure had already been repeatedly affirmed by the House, and especially by an Act which had been passed in 1860 empowering the authorities in the metropolis to provide vehicles for carrying patients to hospitals. That Act having been found to be inoperative he had felt it his duty to introduce the present Bill, for which great necessity existed. It was well known that much injury was done to the public health by persons labouring under infectious and contagious diseases being conveyed to hospitals, and from house to house, in cabs and other public vehicles. He therefore hoped the Government would see the necessity of passing the measure, and thereby removing the alarm in the public mind on the subject. What happened in regard to the London Fever Hospital, which was only one of the many hospitals and other institutions in the metropolis which received patients suffering from these diseases, clearly showed the necessity for the Bill. From the Report of that Hospital for 1861, it appeared that, during the year, 663 patients were admitted. Of that number no less than 110 died, which proved the serious character of the diseases with which the patients were afflicted. Out of the 663 patients, 265 suffered from typhus fever, of which 18 per cent died, and 9 within 48 hours after they had been taken to the hospital. Of those admitted, 156 were afflicted with typhoid fever, of whom 21 per cent died. As cabs were now constructed, having the inside stuffed with wool or hair, and lined with cloth, it was impossible to calculate how long they would retain the contagion that arose from their having been used by persons labouring under typhus, typhoid fever, or the measles. When a servant was seized with typhus—which she might have contracted while attending upon the children or members of the family—the first thing done was to get a cab, and convey her to an hospital or the house of some relative, and no one could tell how long a time should elapse before it could be considered safe for any one to travel in the same vehicle. The cushions and linings of cabs were a kind of material which would retain the infectious matter for a very long period. In cases of scarlet fever, a small piece of linen was known to have retained the contagious influence for a very considerable period. Of the number of patients admitted to the Fever Hospital in 1861, 86 were the servants of subscribers to the hospital. It also appeared that 534 of them had been sent by order of parish authorities. This fact ought to satisfy the House that the duty of furnishing proper carriages for fever patients ought to be placed, as the Bill proposed, in the hands of the parish authorities, and not in those of the police, to which there would be great objection. An hon. Member had mentioned to him a case in which a lady had been taken ill after travelling in a cab which had been employed to convey a person with scarlet fever, and who narrowly escaped with her life. Looking to the injury done to the public health by the present state of things, he hoped the House would agree to the second reading; and if the Bill was not sufficient to carry out its object, they could make whatever Amendments were necessary in Committee.

Mr. Brady

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. AYRTON said, he hoped his hon. Friend would, upon reflection, see the propriety of withdrawing the Bill. A few Sessions ago, when an hon. Member, who took an interest in metropolitan affairs, introduced into a Bill then passing a clause which would have the same effect as the Bill now before the House, he (Mr. Ayrton) pointed out that the clause ought to be permissive, leaving it to the inhabitants of the metropolis to take what course they might think proper. This was an attempt to legislate upon a matter which affected the general convenience and conduct of the inhabitants of the metropolis; but those who were most conversant with metropolitan affairs were the best judges of what should be done. If the inhabitants of any parish saw any real necessity to provide such special conveyances as were mentioned in the Bill, the House might depend on it that they would be careful enough of their own lives to avail themselves of the permissive enactment in the Act of 1860. The Bill was an example of minute and trifling legislation which would do more harm than good. The patient might die while his friends were consulting whether his was a case for a public or a private conveyance; or the cabman might say that his intended fare was infected with a contagious disease and refuse to convey him except on most extortionate terms. What evidence was there that disease had been propagated by public vehicles? He thought that the existing law was sufficient for the object in view; at all events, there had not been experience enough yet to prove its inefficiency.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH was of opinion that the hon. Gentleman who introduced this measure deserved the thanks of the community at large, for it proposed to deal with a very alarming evil. He mentioned a case within his own knowledge, in which a servant with the small-pox had been sent to the hospital in a public cab, to the great danger of the public. It was plain that that cab might be, and probably was, engaged within five minutes after its departure from the hospital for the conveyance of some person who was utterly unsuspecting of the dangerous purpose for which it had just been used. It would be a most extraordinary thing if some measure could not be passed to mitigate the evil. He should be sorry to believe that this matter was beyond the power of legislation. He admitted that it would not do to permit a cabman to refuse any fare; but he would be competent to be an informer. There would be other matters of detail which would, perhaps, require alteration, but that was no reason for ignoring common sense in dealing with these matters.

MR. HENLEY said, he also was quite of opinion that they should take a common-sense view of this question, and therefore he was sorry that the House had not the assistance on the present occasion of that Member of the Government whose business it was to be specially informed on all sanitary matters, for it would have been desirable for the House to have been told whether any parishes had availed themselves of the existing permissive enactment. The House was left wholly in the dark on that point. With reference to the more difficult part of the Bill, the enacting clauses, it was impossible to see how it could be carried out. When he looked at the clauses of the present Bill imposing penalties, he had not the least idea where he was, or what he was standing on. The "interpretation clause" declared that the word "infectious" should include "contagious," and that every "contagious" disease should be deemed to be "infectious." That was working somewhat in a circle, and he was not one jot nearer to a knowledge of what was a contagious or infectious disease. It was right that this matter should be made somewhat clearer before the House subjected people to fines under the Bill. Most persons believed that the itch was catching, but he would not undertake to say whether it was contagious or infectious. At one time another class of diseases was placarded all over London with Dr. Eady's name chalked on the walls.

Was a £10 penalty to be imposed for employing a hackney carriage to convey to the hospital persons suffering from such ailments? He really could not tell, for, unlike the hon. Member for Leitrim, he was not a learned man in this matter. If the Government would undertake the responsibility of putting the Bill into a proper shape, he should be ready to support it; but if the Government did not see their way clear to that end—and he confessed that he did not see his way—he should then be quite disposed to vote against the Bill.

MRS. GEORGE GREY said, that the clause which proposed to effect something of this kind in the Diseases Prevention Act had been afterwards withdrawn. The hon. Gentleman, in the present measure, proposed to make that which was then permissive compulsory; but there was no machinery whatever in the Bill to carry out the system, nor did he think that the provisions of this Bill were capable of being so altered in Committee as to carry into effect the object which the hon. Gentleman had in view. He was not prepared with statistics, nor did he believe that anybody else was, as to the propagation of diseases by public conveyances; but it stood to reason that diseases might be so propagated. Still, if the House passed an enactment prohibiting persons suffering under infectious or contagious diseases from being removed in hackney carriages, without at the same time providing that there should be a ready supply of special conveyances, the undesirable result would be the prevention, in many instances, of the speedy removal of afflicted people to the hospitals; and another effect would be to deter persons from using public conveyances at all. The first clause stated that in the different localities special conveyances were to be provided in sufficient number, and kept in convenient places; but there was no authority to decide as to the sufficiency of the number, or the convenience of the places. He therefore thought that the proposed enactment would be wholly inoperative; and if the object of the Bill was to be attained at all, it must be by different machinery. It was desirable to have some information as to the extent to which parishes had availed themselves of the permissive Act of 1860; and he believed, that if a compulsory enactment were passed, it could only be carried out by means of the police. They had at their various stations

"stretchers," which were carried by a couple of men, and persons, on applying to the nearest policeman, might speedily have that kind of conveyance provided whenever it was required. He was in communication with the Commissioner of Police on the subject, and, under these circumstances, he hoped the present Bill would be withdrawn, or postponed, in order to afford time for further consideration.

MR. HUNT trusted that the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Brady) would withdraw the Bill, for it was quite evident that the measure could not pass in the shape in which it stood at present.

MR. BRADY said, he would act on the suggestion, and would postpone the Bill till after Easter.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Second Reading deferred till Wednesday 27th May.

House adjourned at half
after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, March 19, 1863.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Post Office Savings Banks (No. 47); Consolidated Fund (£10,000,000) (No. 46).

Select Committees—Illegitimate Children (Ireland), Report (No. 49); Poor Relief (Ireland) Act Amendment (No. 12), Report.

Committee—Salmon Exportation (No. 39).

Report—Illegitimate Children (Ireland) (No. 50).

Third Reading—Union Relief Aid Act (1862) Continuance (No. 35); and passed.

METROPOLITAN AND CITY POLICE.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE asked, pursuant to notice, Whether the Government intend to take any Steps with respect to the Consolidation of the Metropolitan and City Police? He thought sufficient time had now elapsed since he drew their Lordship's attention to the confusion which took place in the City on the 7th instant, to have enabled the Government to make up their minds as to the steps necessary to be taken to prevent the recurrence of such unfortunate circumstances. He had no intention of withholding from the authorities of the City of London the full credit due to them for the magnificent preparations which they made for the reception of the Princess

Sir George Grey

Alexandra on the 7th of March; but that only made it the more to be regretted that any occurrence should have taken place to mar the success of the occasion. It was still more painful to think, that with the shout of rejoicing that went forth from the assembled multitude at London Bridge and the Mansion House, there should have been mingled shrieks of terror and pain, arising entirely from the want of proper police arrangements to facilitate the passage of the cavalcade through the City. Attempts had been made to account for the failure of the police on that occasion, and the City Commissioner of Police had endeavoured to cast the blame upon the Volunteers of the City of London. He thought that there had never been a charge more groundless against that gallant body. He had received a statement from the officer commanding the London Rifle Brigade, informing him that he had followed implicitly the arrangements laid down for him by the police, but that he found it utterly impossible to take the route pointed out by a sergeant sent expressly as his guide, or to take up the position assigned to the corps by the Commissioner in his programme. But it turned out that there was a difference of opinion between the Commissioner of Police and the Lord Mayor; for while the Commissioner expected the Volunteers to do something towards preserving public order, the Lord Mayor said they were merely there as objects of show—to be looked at, by whom he did not say—and to be altogether subservient in every way to the arrangements of the police. The effects of the mal-arrangement did not occur only at the places he had mentioned; it occurred throughout the whole route of the procession through the City, and the City authorities themselves must have been much disappointed at the want of success in maintaining the thoroughfare clear, from the manner in which their own procession was broken up by the mob. If, however, the disorder had been limited to that part of the procession, it would not have been so much a matter for regret; but it extended to the very safety of the royal visitors themselves; and no one could read what had been stated by the Clerk Marshal in another place without being struck almost with horror at the position in which the royal carriage was placed on that day. In fact, the progress through the City was due almost entirely to the good humour of Lord Alfred Paget, and the anxiety of the people themselves to make way for it. This was not the result of any unexpected pressure. The City authorities had been warned of the pressure which would occur, and were offered assistance in the form both of police and cavalry. This, however, they refused—they placed an unfortunate reliance upon their own power, which utterly failed, and showed how totally unfit they and their police were to cope with an occasion of this kind. Now, it was necessary some steps should be taken to prevent the recurrence of such a state of things as that to which he had adverted; and the only step which could have the effect, was, he believed, the immediate amalgamation of the City with the great body of the Metropolitan Police—a course which ought long since to have been adopted, and the absurd anomaly of having an area of 700 acres kept in order by one set of men, while an area of 78,000 acres in the same metropolis was governed by another, thus done away with. He had, he might add, heard the late Sir Robert Peel say over and over again in the House of Commons, that it was his conviction that one body of police should govern the whole of London. In 1854 a Royal Commission, which mustered among its Members the late Justice Pattison and the present Secretary of State for the War Department (Sir George Lewis), most clearly and distinctly recommended the amalgamation which he was advocating. In giving his evidence, moreover, before that Commission, the late Mr. Daniel Whittle Harvey, the Chief Commissioner of City Police, stated that it was utterly impossible that the detective duties of the police in the metropolis could be carried on by two separate bodies; and it was said, that had he not been afraid of pulling down his house about his ears, he would have given similar evidence with respect to their protective duties. But, be that as it might, the time had clearly come for the settlement of the question, and he felt assured, that if Her Majesty's Government would only take it up boldly, they would be supported in disposing of it, not only by the voices of Members of both Houses of Parliament, but by those of the inhabitants of the metropolis generally, with the exception, perhaps, of some persons who thought that the City of London constituted a body which ought in no respect to be interfered with, however great the benefit to the public at large which such interference might bring about. For his own part, he had no desire to interfere with the general privileges of the City of London, or with those great bodies who dispensed so splendid an hospitality within its limits; but he felt bound at the same time to ask the Government to take into their serious consideration the necessity which existed for securing on all extraordinary public occasions that security for life and property which recent events proved it was in the power of the Metropolitan Police to secure, and which was everywhere secured throughout the metropolis, with the exception of that particular portion of it over which they happened to have no control. He trusted something would be done by the Government to prevent the recurrence of such scenes as had been witnessed on Saturday the 7th of March, and on the subsequent Tuesday, when the want of an efficient police force in the City had been attended with such lamentable results.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he could to a certain extent confirm, from personal experience, what had been stated by his noble Friend as to very different arrangements which had been made by the Metropolitan Police and those within the City on the occasion to which he had adverted. His noble Friend the Postmaster General, as well as himself, had contrived to see a very large portion of the route, both within and without the City, on the 7th, and there could be no doubt that in the City the confusion was not only very great, but in certain parts almost alarming. Indeed, when he arrived at the Mansion House it appeared to him, as well as his noble Friend, that it would be quite impossible to clear the way for the Royal procession at that point. He had, at the same time, never been struck so much by anything as by the great good humour which the people assembled—he would not call them the mob—in the City and elsewhere had exhibited, whether restrained by the police outside the City or left very much to their own guidance within it. He felt also bound to say that at Temple Bar a large body of City Police were stationed, who were most zealous, and also very civil, in the discharge of their duties. But in some parts of the route, where all progress seemed impossible, he went for a distance of three quarters of a mile without seeing a single policeman, or any attempt to clear the way. But he could scarcely look upon that circumstance as a reflection on the City Police, when it was borne in mind that they had at their disposal a comparatively small number of men to control a vast multitude composed of hundreds of thousands of people. With respect to the particular question put to him by his noble Friend, as to what the Government proposed to do with respect to the amalgamation of the City and Metropolitan Police, he could only say that it was one which the Home Department had lost no time in taking into its consideration. The Home Secretary had written at once to the Lord Mayor, calling his attention to the facts which had been stated with regard to the confusion which had prevailed within the City on the occasion of the Royal procession, and asking him for an explanation both as regarded the numbers of the police on duty on the occasion, the mode of their disposition, and the other different arrangements made by the City authorities to insure due order being maintained during the progress of the interesting ceremonial. The letter had been immediately acknowledged by the Lord Mayor, who stated that an investigation into the matter would at once be set on foot, and that the result would, without delay, be communicated to the Home Office. Up to the present moment, however, no further information on the subject had been received from the Lord Mayor. The Secretary for the Home Department mean time had taken other means to inform himself on the subject generally; but it would be clearly wrong for the Government to come to any definite discussion in reference to it until the necessary facts had been duly laid before them. He was therefore unable to announce that the Government had as yet come to any positive determination in the matter. He had simply to say, in conclusion, that it was the more to be regretted that any confusion should have occurred in the City on the occasion of the Royal procession, because of the great good taste—especially as evinced at London Bridge—of the preparations which had been made by the City authorities to receive the Princess.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE said, that as he had been alluded to in another place, he might perhaps be allowed to say a few words with respect to the military arrangements which had been made on the occasion of the Royal procession. He was anxious that a certain amount of military assistance should be given in the City; but he was bound to say that the offer of such assistance was, in the first instance, refused. On the Tuesday previous to the procession he had held a meeting of officers who were to be on duty, with the Chief Commissioner of Metropolitan Police. He felt very strongly that aid should be rendered to the City authorities; but he was aware that that aid could not be afforded without an actual request coming from those authorities themselves. He therefore requested Sir Richard Mayne to put himself into communication with the City authorities on the subject, and to suggest to them the expediency of making similar arrangements to those which were being made for the West End. On Thursday morning he received a communication from the Superintendent of Police of the City of London—he was not, however, quite sure by whom it was signed—stating that no military aid was required. This seemed so perfectly monstrous, that being personally acquainted with the Lord Mayor, he took the liberty of sending to him Sir Richard Airey, the Quartermaster General, with a request that he would oblige him (the Duke of Cambridge) by allowing a certain number of troops to go into the City, fearing that otherwise something very serious might occur. In the first instance, he believed, the Lord Mayor, though extremely amiable and courteous in his reply, did not consider it necessary to have such assistance; but on Sir Richard Airey proceeding to point out the expediency of further considering the subject, and one or two others of the City authorities having been called in to take part in the deliberation, it was arranged, after some little discussion, that some troops should be sent. The Lord Mayor had stated, that if they had sent Life Guards instead of Artillery, there would have been no confusion. He did not understand upon what ground that argument was based, for he could not see why one body of troops should be better than another for the purpose. He was quite aware that the Household Cavalry had had great experience in dealing with large bodies of people in the streets, and it was very well known that they invariably acted with great forbearance, and did their work really well. He felt the responsibility of sending other troops into the City, but he had only Artillery at his disposal, and he particularly instructed the officers commanding the Artillery to warn the men to exercise the greatest forbearance, and to allow the people to see as much as possible. He had since spoken to various persons who were in the crowd at the time, and they informed him that they had never seen anything like the good humour and forbearance shown by the Artillery ; and he had been further told that but for the ten or dozen men in front of the Mansion House the procession never would have got on at all. It had been said that the trappings of the Artillery rendered them unsuitable for this kind of duty ; but he could only say that the trappings of the Artillery were the same as those of the rest of the army. He was also bound to speak for the Lieutenant Colonel of the Volunteer Rifles of the City of London. He had the honour to be Colonel of the regiment. He had had no communication upon this subject with any one, but he had read with care and attention the letter from Lieutenant Colonel Ward in The Times, which had never been contradicted, and it seemed to him that that officer had literally obeyed the orders which he received. If the orders were incorrect, they should have been changed. They were published long before the day of the procession, and he believed they were most strictly obeyed. Perhaps it would have been better if the Volunteers had not mustered in Guildhall Yard ; but why was the commanding officer not told so ? He believed that the City authorities, on the contrary made no communication on the subject. With respect to the question whether or not the City of London should retain its own exclusive police, it was not for him to express an opinion. But one observation he wished to make. He believed that the force was composed of very good men, but on Saturday week they undertook a task which was entirely beyond their strength. To take charge of the whole line from London Bridge to Temple Bar with such an amount of force was impossible. He thought it highly objectionable that on great occasions like that of Saturday week two or three authorities should divide amongst them the responsibility of preserving order ; and whether the two forces were amalgamated or not, he hoped that some arrangement would be made to produce uniformity of action in future. There was a great difficulty about the military authorities. They were desired to assist the civil power, but the City of London was hermetically sealed to them. Although he had the command of the army, and communicated with the greatest cordiality and good feeling with the Metropolitan Police, he had positively no right to ask the City of London authorities any question upon the subject. They were extremely courteous in making arrangements, and he should be sorry if it were thought that he had said anything discourteous to them. He had no such feeling ; but he felt that on great occasions, when order and regularity were essential, it was necessary that Her Majesty's Government should take means to place the conduct of the arrangements in the hands of some one authority, and he was convinced, that if that were not done, some frightful calamity would occur on some future great occasion. The City of London had come forward most nobly in the reception which they had given to the Royal Princess, and their arrangements on the whole had been excellent ; but he certainly did not think that their police arrangements were so. It was very wise, in his opinion, to give orders that the Volunteers should not take any part in keeping back the crowd. However well-conducted they might be, they were unaccustomed to the duty, and could not be expected to perform it in the same way as soldiers. The armed force which was allowed to interfere with crowds should be under the strictest discipline and accustomed to military obedience—two conditions which they could not expect to find fulfilled in the case of the Volunteers. He hoped, that whatever the decision might be with regard to the amalgamation of the two police forces, Her Majesty's Government would take some steps to constitute a central authority by whom, on another similar occasion, order and regularity might be more easily maintained and more thoroughly preserved. He could not sit down without expressing the great satisfaction with which he had observed in all the streets the great order and regularity of the Metropolitan Police and the courteous manner in which they behaved to the crowd, while at the same time efficiently performing their duty ; and he was glad of the opportunity of thus bringing their conduct prominently to the notice of the House.

Earl Granville

LORD TAUNTON said, he was Chairman of the Commission which sat eleven years ago to investigate this question of the City Police, and so distinctly was he impressed with the importance of having one police force for the whole metropolis, that he should regret if this opportunity were lost of making a reform which the circumstances of the case imperatively required. On so great an occasion as the procession through the City, no matter what were the arrangements, but for the good conduct of the people it would be impossible to avoid some accidents. It was plain that very defective arrangements were made in the City, but his opinion was not based upon what had recently taken place. Of late years it must have been a source of pride and congratulation that the immense congregation of human beings in the metropolis had been attended with scarcely any disturbances; but, however much they might rejoice, whatever confidence they might entertain, it would be the extreme of imprudence not to insist on the establishment of an efficient police in it, and as long as the anomaly of the City Police existed, they could not have an efficient police. What were the circumstances under which that force had a separate existence and organization? An area of one square mile, which was taken charge of by the City Police, was surrounded by an area of 570 square miles in the hands of the Metropolitan Police, and even the ground between high and low-water mark within the City boundaries was not within the jurisdiction of the City Police. Nothing could be more inconvenient than such a state of things, and any one who would read the evidence of the late Mr. Daniel Whittle Harvey the late Commissioner of the City Police, and a most able officer, could not fail to come to the conclusion that an end ought to be put to that anomaly. It was stated to the Commission that the rate of pay of the City Police was raised in comparison with that of the Metropolitan Police, and the excuse was that the men were required to be fine, tall men to gratify the City authorities, although the duty was not more laborious in the City than elsewhere. Of all the institutions in the country the most difficult to reform or interfere with was the City of London. They might reform the House of Commons; they might reform the law; but any Administration which loved its ease was very careful how it placed a finger on any abuse connected with the City. He was no enemy to the City of London. With its ancient associations, and a fame dear and venerable to Englishmen, he wished to see it kept up in decent state, with the power of exercising hospitality and indulging in harmless pieces of show; but it ought not to be allowed to do what was actually mischievous to the rest of the metropolis. He prayed their Lordships not to be put off by the answer that this could wait for a general reform. If they waited for a general reform of the City of London, they would have to wait until the Greek Kalends. He despaired of a general reform, and he hoped Her Majesty's Government would not let slip this opportunity of making a much-needed improvement. Although he had an immense opinion of the obstructive power of the City of London in the other House of Parliament, the case was so clear, and public attention had been so directed to it, that he had no doubt the Government could; if they pleased, succeed in destroying an anomaly, and establishing one general and efficient body of police for this great metropolis. They would not be meddling with any ancient institution, for the present system was not above twenty-five years old. Formerly each ward in the City had its own police, and it was only when the Metropolitan Police was established that the whole force was put under one head.

Lord Taunton

LORD OVERSTONE said, he much regretted that any such occasion should have arisen for this discussion, but was surprised that an anomaly so absurd and so inconvenient should have existed so long. Reasoning about it was out of the question altogether; it was a case for denunciation, and not for argument. The City Police extended over a district of a mile and a half square, and a population of 170,000 persons; and was placed in the middle of the great metropolitan district, embracing a population of 3,000,000. The simplest application of common sense must show at once that such a system must produce great inconveniences. If in the centre of a great army sent into the field for important operations were placed a small division entirely separate and distinct from the rest, differently organized and differently trained, and with independent commanders, it was evident that the whole efficiency of the general military force would be destroyed. It was hard to understand how this anomaly had been suffered so long. It had been said that we were a practical people, and never made any alteration until a grievance had been clearly shown; in fact, that we required "a bishop to be burnt," as was wittily said by the late Mr. Sidney Smith; but surely the Government could require no stronger practical proof of the inefficiency of the present system, and no stronger incitement to do their best to amend it, than the extreme inconvenience and reasonable apprehension to which it had subjected the Princess in her passage through the City. The answer of the President of the Council was certainly not what they might reasonably expect, and he was convinced, that if they would take the question up with a strong hand, they would meet with most efficient support from both Houses of Parliament, and from public feeling out of doors. He could not for one moment suppose that the Government would be deterred from a course which the public interest imperatively demanded by the paraphernalia of the Corporation, their fine dresses, their state coaches, or their magnificent entertainments. If they would show a little firmness and determination, all the opposition would speedily vanish, and they would be enabled to put an end to an anomaly which at present paralysed the whole police system of the metropolis.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK BILL.

Bill read 1st. (No. 47.)

CONSOLIDATED FUND (£10,000,000) BILL.

Bill read 1st. (No. 48.)

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, till to-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, March 19, 1863.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—Thames Conservancy, &c., appointed (List of Members).

PUBLIC BILLS.—First Reading—Public Houses [Bill 67]; Local Government Act (1858) Amendment [Bill 68]; Vaccination (Ireland) [Bill 70]; Judgments Law Amendment (Ireland) [Bill 71].

Second Reading—Marine Mutiny; Inclosure.

Committee—Tobacco Duties [Bill 56]; Corrupt Practices at Elections [Bill 8]; Telegraphs [Bill 16] r. p.; Mutiny; Trustees (Scotland) Act Amendment [Bill 59].

Report—Tobacco Duties [Bill 56]; Corrupt Practices at Elections [Bill 68]; Mutiny; Trustees (Scotland) Act Amendment.

Third Reading—Hares (Ireland) [Bill 51]; and passed.

PUBLIC HOUSES BILL.

Bill for closing Public Houses on Sunday, presented, and read 1st. [Bill 67.]

THE CLOTHING FACTORY AT PIMLICO.

QUESTION.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War,

Whether it is true, as asserted, that an order has been issued by the Director of Clothing to the women employed at the Royal Clothing Factory at Pimlico by which they are ordered to provide themselves with the undermentioned articles by the first of April next—namely, one black lace cap, trimmed with scarlet riband, one Garibaldi jacket of violet llama, and one large jean apron, the cost of which articles will be 10s. at least; and that those not complying with the order are to be dismissed; and whether it is true that the average amount earned by those women does not exceed 10s. per week?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, in reply, that the adoption of the uniform dress, to which the question referred, was purely voluntary. He understood that those workwomen who were willing to adopt the dress were furnished with it for 3s. 5d., which sum they paid by weekly stoppages of 3d., and their wages were between 9s. and 10s. a week.

RETIREMENT ON HALF PAY.

LIEUTENANT COLONEL CHARTERIS.

QUESTION.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for War, Why the Royal Warrant, dated 28th March 1861, which prescribes twenty-five years as a necessary preliminary to the privilege of retiring on half-pay, was departed from in the case of Lieutenant Colonel the Honourable Richard Charteris, who was on the personal staff of the Commander-in-Chief, and who only completed his twenty-one years of service in October 1861; also, for what reason a similar indulgence has been refused to other Officers of the Army?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, in reply, that Colonel Charteris had not retired under the warrant of March 1861. He had exchanged with an officer on the half-pay list, in accordance with a regulation which he (Sir G. Lewis) understood had been rarely refused to be applied in the case of officers who were recommended by the Commander-in-Chief. Any officer who had served twenty-five years might claim to go on the half-pay list without any exchange.

MR. CONINGHAM said, the hon. Baronet had not answered the latter part of the question.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was not aware of any case of refusal. If the hon. Gentleman would mention any such case he would undertake to make inquiry into it.

THE ISLAND OF SAN JUAN.

QUESTION.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What progress has been made towards a settlement of the dispute between the Government of Great Britain and the late United States of America, as to the Island of San Juan; if any Correspondence between the two Governments has recently taken place on that subject, and if there be any objection to lay the same before this House?

MR. LAYARD, in reply, said, since the breaking-out of civil war in the United States the communications between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States on the subject had been suspended. No communications had recently taken place on the subject, and those that did take place some time ago were not complete, and it would be inexpedient, therefore, now to place them on the table of the House.

NAVAL AID TO CHINA—QUESTION.

MR. ADDINGTON said, that he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the Officers of the Royal Navy now in the service of the Emperor of China have received permission from the Admiralty to wear the uniform of Her Majesty's Navy during the period of such service; and whether there would be any objection on the part of the Government to produce a Copy of the Instructions given to Commodore Sherard Osborn on his proceeding to China?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, in reply, that the officers who were about to serve under the Chinese Government were not entitled to wear Her Majesty's uniform in that service. As to that part of the question relating to instructions given to Commodore Osborn, he had to state that the Admiralty issued no instructions whatever to that officer. He was absent on foreign leave, and would obtain his half-pay, as he and other officers were, by an Order in Council, allowed to serve under the Chinese Government.

MR. ADDINGTON said, he wished to know whether the noble Lord was aware that the naval uniform was worn by those officers.

Sir George Lewis

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he believed that the Emperor of China had established a uniform for the naval officers.

MR. ADDINGTON said, he spoke from information he had received when he stated that officers with Commodore Osborn were wearing the naval uniform.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET replied, that all he could say was, that they were not entitled to wear Her Majesty's uniform.

THE DEBATE ON GREECE—MR. ELLIOT.

EXPLANATION.

MR. GREGORY: Perhaps the House will allow me to detain it for one moment on a personal matter. It will be remembered that the other night, in the course of the observations that I made in the debate on the subject of Greece, I alluded to Mr. Elliot. I mentioned that Mr. Elliot had been sent to Greece, thereby virtually superseding Mr. Scarlett; and I also alluded at the same time to a report which was current at one time that it was the intention of the Foreign Office last year to remove Sir James Hudson from Turin, and replace him by Mr. Elliot. I am sure the House will remember that the observations were made merely in a spirit of banter, and not in the least with the idea of giving offence. But I regret to hear that those observations have given pain to Mr. Elliot's family. I am told also that I have been entirely misinformed as to any steps ever having been taken by the Foreign Office for replacing Sir James Hudson and substituting Mr. Elliot; and further, that it never was the intention of the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office to make any such change. I extremely regret that I made any such observations, and thus gave pain to a gentleman who, I believe, is a most honourable and deserving servant of the Crown.

TOBACCO DUTIES BILL—[BILL 21.]

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in moving that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, appealed to the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) to allow the Motion to pass in lieu of raising the preliminary question of referring the Bill to a Select Committee. He made the appeal first, because he believed that it was wholly without precedent, when a proposal affecting the revenue as well as the trade of the country had been submitted to the House by the executive Government on their own responsibility, that the House should decline to pronounce judgment on the proposal and refer it to a Committee upstairs. He would not, however, rely upon that precedent if he did not believe that it was founded in wisdom, and that much inconvenience would arise from the departure from it in the present instance. He believed there was no more searching examination than that which a responsible Minister of the Crown underwent in a Committee of the Whole House. The effect of sending a financial proposal to a Select Committee was entirely to shift the responsibility from the Finance Minister to his permanent advisers, the officers of the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments. The Finance Minister, if he were indolently disposed, might sit with folded arms, and allow those officers to fight it out as well as they could. But who was to be responsible for the Bill afterwards? The House had uniformly acted upon the principle that the Minister alone was to be held responsible for Bills of this description. If, on the other hand, matters of the kind were to be bandied about in a Committee, the only effect would be to relax the rules upon which public business was conducted, and to weaken the hold of the House over the executive Government. Wishing to avoid this, he deprecated the Motion of which the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Ayrton) had given notice. But great inconvenience would also arise from dealing with the proposal in the manner suggested. The hon. and learned Gentleman had held communications with his constituents and with others in the trade; but he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) might venture to say that the communications which the Government had had the opportunity of holding were much more comprehensive and varied than it was possible for the hon. and learned Gentleman to have held. It was the duty of the Government to make as good an investigation as they could into a subject before they made any proposal to the House. Then, after the proposal had been submitted, it was their further duty to avail themselves of every opportunity for improving the details of the measure. And in an experience of twenty years he had uniformly seen meaasures thus brought in and discussed by all parties, either directly or by their representatives in a Committee of the Whole House. He felt entitled to say that the hon. and learned Gentleman, in the Motion which he was to make, was not acting in conformity with the wishes of those who were interested in the matter. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had seen parties interested in the trade who came from Scotland and Ireland, and the Bill, with the further Amendments which it was proposed to introduce, was satisfactory to them. He was afraid it was not satisfactory to the constituents of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Ayrton); but the difference mainly was upon the duty upon segars, and he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) contended that that was a question which ought to be dealt with in a Committee of the Whole House. A statement had been circulated that the dilatory proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman need not, in carrying out, occupy more than a fortnight. He did not know who drew up that statement, but it must have been some one unacquainted with Parliamentary business, and especially with that relating to the Tobacco Duties. A Select Committee was appointed to sit on the Tobacco Duties in 1844. It was appointed on the 14th March, and it reported on the 1st August in that year. If the hon. and learned Gentleman's proposal was carried, his Committee would be appointed about the same time as that of 1844; it would begin to sit just when the Finance Minister had to submit to the House the financial measures for the year; it would report somewhere towards the close of the Session; and the object of certain parties would be gained, by all legislation being put off for the year. He ventured to say that that was not what was desired by those who were most interested in the subject. He had received a letter from one of the largest importing houses in London—a house than which there was none, he believed, better entitled to speak on behalf of the trade—he meant Grant, Hodgson, & Co., of Fenchurch Street—and the purport of that letter was to state the apprehension with which they viewed the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and the inconvenience to which long delays in the settlement of commercial questions necessarily gave rise. They further expressed a hope that the hon. and learned Gentleman's Motion would not be adopted. It was really for the interests of the trade that this question should be settled without delay, and that the decision of the House should not be postponed to meet the views of those whose object, like that of all traders in every branch who were apprehensive of a change, was to defeat effective legislation. On these grounds he appealed to the hon. and learned Member to withdraw his Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. AYRTON said, nothing would afford him greater pleasure personally than to accede to the request of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. If, however, any new argument were wanting to confirm him in the intention which he had formed, it would be the speech which the right hon. Gentleman had just made. It now appeared that the Bill before them was to be subjected to further Amendments in order to propitiate the Scotch and Irish trade, while a less influential interest was to be left with its grievances unredressed. He denied that his Motion was in substance a novelty. He had not searched the Journals of the House for precedents; but as long as the proposal was not inconsistent with their forms, it was perfectly competent to adopt it, if the novel circumstances created by the Chancellor of the Exchequer necessitated it. It was certainly something new in the history of legislation that a measure of this kind, affecting both trade and finance, and contradicting the deliberate opinion of a Select Committee, should be pressed through the House without any fresh examination of the subject and without a fraction of unprejudiced and authentic evidence to support it. The right hon. Gentleman had not always been so averse to Committees. He was very fond of representing himself as solicited by two ladies in opposite directions, and last Session two rival charmers appealed to him in regard to the sugar duties. The free-trade party demanded equal duties, and the manufacturers a scale of duties. Under those circumstances, the right hon. Gentleman agreed to a Committee. Again, when those imposts which were called the "vexatious trade duties," and of which the right hon. Gentleman was the author, came before the House, his parental fondness for them inclined him one way and the menace of the City merchants another way. In order to solve the difficulty, a Committee was appointed, with the right hon. Gentleman's consent. What ground, then, had the right hon. Gentleman for saying that the proposal now made was a dangerous novelty? The Chancellor of the Exchequer's argument was based on the gratuitous assumption that the appointment of a Committee would diminish his official responsibility. It would do no such thing. It would merely collect all the information that could be got, make a Report, and leave the right hon. Gentleman to form his own conclusions. It was idle to say that the proposal to refer the Bill to Select a Committee would have the effect of removing responsibility from the Government. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he made such a statement, must have forgotten that the Bill would come back from the Select Committee, and would then be considered in a Committee of the Whole House. Let him remind the House of what was done only a few years ago. No subject was more invested with the sacred attribute of responsibility than the patronage involved in the promotion and retirement of officers of the Crown; yet, when that matter was brought forward, the Government were quite prepared to divest themselves of responsibility, and to send the question to a Committee upstairs, where the Members chosen for the purpose were proceeding as if they were executors disposing of an estate. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would recognise the precedent thus set by the noble Lord at the head of the Government. Surely they were not going to be told that one Minister might have a policy of his own, making a reputation at the expense of another, for that was a kind of political morality which the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be the first to disclaim. If, then, the right hon. Gentleman was bound by the precedent of his own Colleague, he could not set up the bugbear of responsibility in opposition to the proposal for an investigation by a Select Committee. No doubt, when the Bill first came before the House, it had the weight of the previous knowledge and the acquired certainty of judgment of the Government; but it had since undergone very extensive alterations, and, in point of fact, none of its original propositions remained. Upon what ground could the Government now ask the House to rely on their judgment? What guarantee had the House that their present judgment was better than the one which they submitted on the introduction of the Bill? If there had been so much acknowledged error—if the House had got rid of those pretensions to infallibility which free-trade enthusiasts too frequently set up—surely he had a right to imagine that something still remained requiring careful and deliberate investigation. He accepted the principle that there was to be a duty equivalent to that imposed upon the imported article, and that there was to be a surcharge by way of compensation for the increased expense put upon the English manufacturer by reason of his working a highly-taxed commodity under a most oppressive system of combined Customs and Excise; but he denied that the application of that principle in the present instance was either just or honest towards the English manufacturer and English workmen. How could the contradictory statements upon that point be examined in anything like a satisfactory manner in a Committee of the Whole House? The elements of the difference between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and himself were of a most complex and confused character, and embraced many facts requiring minute investigation. One of them was the loss in weight of tobacco by reason of the diminution of moisture; and the result of the whole was, that the English manufacturer, not desiring to prevent or delay a change, but wishing to meet the question fairly, declared that the equivalent of all the difficulties he had to encounter was a duty of 6s. per pound. But there were other and greater difficulties which required to be examined in a Committee. When the English manufacturer had to make cigars, he must make them as he could out of whole bales of tobacco; and the consequence was, that when he had made good cigars at a profit, he had to make up his waste material and sell it at a loss. Thus cigars were actually sold in this country at 6s. 3d. per pound, duty and all. The foreign manufacturer laboured under no such disadvantage. Moreover, the English manufacturer was not allowed a drawback, so as to enable him, when his market was glutted with a particular quality, to relieve himself by exportation. The circumstances of a trade so hampered as that could not be properly dealt with by a Committee of the Whole House. The English manufacturer ought to have an equivalent for the prohibitions to which he was subject, and to be put upon a par with the foreigner by being released from vexatious restrictions. The trade had not slighted the Chancellor of the Exchequer in this matter, but the right hon. Gentlemen had declined to accept their statements. How, then, was the House to decide between the two? The ground on which he asked that this whole question as regarded the makers of cigars should be investigated was, that when all the evidence had been obtained, the Government might be able advisedly to come down with a proposition doing justice to this branch of manufacture. He was glad that he had not to enter into the other branches of the trade, because the Chancellor of the Exchequer had assented to what was necessary for the protection of their interests. But there still remained other points demanding consideration. One manufacturer might say he was satisfied with an assurance from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this Bill would not be worked to his prejudice; but another man might prefer to have the security of an Act of Parliament to a letter from that right hon. Gentleman. The provisions of the Bill, as they stood, were perfectly illusory; because they proposed a system of charging the duties according to the quantity of moisture in tobacco, without defining what moisture was, or stating the principle on which it was to be calculated. The amount of alcohol in wine could be told by any chemist; but no chemist could tell how much moisture there was in tobacco, so as to bring it within one scale of duty or another. Instead of its being left absolutely to the discretion of the officers of Excise in cases of dispute, the principle on which the duty was to be computed should be contained within the four corners of the Act, so that the trader might easily calculate it for himself. He would not enter into further details, lest the Chancellor of the Exchequer should charge him with wishing to envelope the question in a cloud of mystification. The petition presented to that House by the working men, and endorsed by their masters, was based on the circumstances under which that manufacture was carried on in this country and on the Continent respectively. These persons said, the result of this Bill would be to reduce them to destitution. The Chancellor of the Exchequer might say, "Oh! these are phantoms which you have raised up on the side of protection." Now, it might be very pleasant for a man to indulge in the dreams of his own imagination, and to fancy that all the prosperity of the country sprang from his measures. But death from starvation was no phantom, but a stern reality; and that stern reality he wished to avert from the borough he had the honour to represent. It had been the fashion to gloss over the sufferings of other branches of trade by vague talk about the prosperity of Lancashire, and to say that the giant industry of that county would absorb all the unemployed operatives in other districts. But what had now become of the boasted prosperity of Lancashire? Five hundred thousand of her working people were now the pauperized recipients of the public bounty. Was this a time, then, for even running the risk of creating further distress? The Chancellor of the Exchequer might rely upon the classical maxim, "Divide et impera;" and having got rid of those who were most troublesome by their numbers, he might think he could easily deal with some 2,000 persons who had only one or two representatives in that House. But was it right to consign them to the condition which they said would be the inevitable result of this legislation? History abounded in instances where very small circumstances had seemed to produce very great results; but that had only happened in countries which had fallen into such a condition that it needed but a spark to produce a conflagration. Was there no fire now smouldering? There was not a Lancashire manufacturer who dared to stand up in that House and speak upon the condition of that county at this moment; and when a notice was given by an hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ferrand) to call attention to that subject, it had struck all the manufacturers with terror, and they were quaking in their shoes at the possible consequences which might ensue. He knew that the curtain raised the other day by a leading public journal, just to give nice, fashionable people a glimpse of what was going on in Lancashire, was only lifted up in part, and that what was thereby revealed was as nothing compared with what still remained undisclosed. If they chose to send these people to starve, they had the power to do so, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had the eloquence to excite them to do it; but he, at least, would have the satisfaction of knowing that he had made an appeal to the justice and generosity of the House of Commons. He begged to move the Amendment of which he had given notice.

Mr. Ayrton

COLONEL FRENCH seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be committed to a Select Committee,"—instead thereof.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 170; Noes 87: Majority 83.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Duties on Manufactured Tobacco).

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought it would be for the convenience of the Committee that he should state, in a very few words, some of the changes or adjustments which he proposed in the Bill. He had hoped that the Bill would pass through its remaining stages very speedily; but as those changes, though simple, would be numerous, he should propose to reprint it after it had gone through Committee. The first change was with regard to the duty on high-dried snuff. That was a very peculiar question—it was highly improbable there would ever be a large trade in this commodity. He proposed then, first, to raise the duty upon high-dried snuff, or rather to lessen the diminution of duty, so as to leave it at 4s. 6d. instead of 4s. 2d.; and secondly, to alter the standard of what should be called high-dried snuff from 10 to 13 per cent. The next change which he proposed to make related to foreign cavendish in bond, the duty on which he proposed to fix at 4s. 6d. instead of 4s.; and to fix the duty upon British cavendish in bond at 4s. instead of 3s. 8d. The third change he proposed was to make a very small addition to the drawback. At present the drawback was fixed by the Bill upon the assumption of a certain average amount of moisture, and that drawback as now fixed was an exact measure of the amount of duty. But wishing to make the measure as liberal towards the trade as he could consistently with the interests of the revenue, he had thought it fair and right to propose to the Committee to take into view the fact that upon all descriptions of tobacco manufactured there was a certain amount of inevitable waste, from absolute loss in the manipulation, the cutting, grinding, &c., amounting perhaps to 1 or 2 per cent. In the particular case of high-dried snuff it amounted to much more. Persons engaged in the manufacture were aware of the difficulty, and that it was found impossible to arrange the drawback upon this material differently. He therefore proposed, with regard to all kinds of drawback, to raise the standard—or rather the pivot, if he might so speak—of drawback from 3s. to 3s. 3d. a pound all round. This would be a considerable advantage to the export trade in general. The fourth proposed change related to the provisions contained in the Bill, according to which 3s. 6d. would be chargeable upon the importation of all tobacco which contained less moisture than 10 per cent. There had been a very justifiable anxiety on the part of the importers that the bearings of this question should be carefully explained. One gentleman, named Lloyd, to his great astonishment, had sent in a statement which he thought would make the hair on the head of his hon. Friend the Member for the City (Mr. Crawford) stand on end. It was the desire of this gentleman, and of the trade which he represented, that all tobacco, on its importation, should be tested in order to ascertain what quantity of moisture it contained. The hon. and learned Member (Mr. Ayrton) would probably take up the cudgels for Mr. Lloyd, who was one of his constituents; but this view was so diametrically opposed to anything that had been stated by any person acquainted with the sentiments of importers and manufacturers that he (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) could only condole with the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets with regard to the errors of those whose organ—a most able zealous one, he admitted—he was. The hon. Member for the City had expressed a hope that nothing of the sort would take place, inasmuch as the proposition would have the effect of barring a trade that was special and indirect, and had for its aim a sort of evasion of duty. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), acting upon the representations of some gentlemen from Liverpool, represented by the Members for that town, had inserted in the Bill a few words, in the first clause, making provision that no tobacco which, when imported into this country, was packed in the usual manner, should be subject to testing for moisture, unless by the special order of the Board of Customs. There was a reservation, however, that the test should be applied if the Board considered it necessary. These were the only changes, beyond mere verbal alterations, which he proposed to make in the Bill.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE wished to ask, with reference to the first clause, whether there was to be a limit to the drawback on stalks? He understood it was to be limited to those stalks only which were used in the manufacture of snuff.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that there was no change whatever on the point referred to. The intention had never been to allow a drawback upon stalks, for reasons connected with the revenue laws. But by the Bill a drawback was to be allowed on snuffs, of which stalks were the raw material, and on the stalks when cut up in the regular process, along with the leaf, as “bird’s-eye tobacco.”

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to correct one error into which the right hon. Gentleman had fallen. The right hon. Gentleman had said that the trade was in favour of discriminating duties. The fact was, that the trade did not wish for discriminating duties at all; but they said, that if they were to have them, they preferred to have them more reasonable than they were in the Bill; they desired that they should not proceed by jumps of 10 per cent, but by steps of 5 per cent.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he read a letter from Mr. Charles Lloyd, who, he believed, was the feeder of the hon. and learned Gentleman of all the information he possessed on the subject, in which he stated that it was perfectly necessary for the establishment of fair competition between the home producer and the foreigner that there should be paid on moist tobacco a proportionate rate of duty with that levied on dry tobacco. Why, this was the very thing to which the hon. and learned Member was opposed; but Mr. Lloyd said it was one of the three things that were essentially necessary.

MR. AYRTON pointed out that the letter contained some qualifying expressions.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that no doubt the hon. and learned Gentleman was entitled to the benefit of the whole of the contents of the letter. With regard to segars, he would not detain the Committee at length, but he would be prepared to answer any questions which might be put to him on that point. The case of segars must be considered as one involving various features, because segars were made from tobacco coming from many different quarters. He would illustrate the case of segars by two examples—one of average tobacco made into segars, the other an extreme case with a view of testing the proposition of a 5s. duty. He held that it was not the duty of Parliament to undertake to cover every extreme instance in every minute ramification of trade. That, he thought, was a sound principle, and a principle on which their legislation had hitherto proceeded; but in the present instance he did not hesitate to say that his proposal covered every case that had been brought within his knowledge, and every case that he believed existed in the ordinary course of trade; and if they had known as much before his proposal was made as they knew now, he did not think he should be justified in proposing so high a discriminating duty as 5s. on the foreign article. Now, with regard to the example of segars made from tobacco of ordinary quality, including Havannah of a somewhat dry kind, Yarra, German, and Dutch tobacco, he would assume, for the purpose of calculation, an importation of 100 lbs. of tobacco. He would first calculate the duty directly paid by the manufacturer on that 100 lbs., next any indirect charges entailed upon him, and then he would put down, on the other side, any sets-off that might be made. He would take the number of pounds of segars which the manufacturer could make out of 100 lbs. of tobacco, and divide the total amount of duty paid, directly or indirectly, by the number of pounds of segars made out of the 100 lbs. of tobacco, and that would give the amount of countervailing duty. Now, 100 lbs. of Havannah leaf, of a somewhat dry quality, yielded 17 lbs. of stalks, which, though not worth anything for entering into segars, would sell for 2s. 4d. a pound in the market. There would be 14 lbs. of refuse and moisture from such an amount of this tobacco. Deducting 17 lbs. of stalk and 14 lbs. of refuse, or 31 lbs., from 100 lbs., there would remain 69 lbs. of segars to be got from 100 lbs. of tobacco. Now, the duty paid, including the allowance for interest on the duty between the time when the article was imported and the time when the duty was received back from the consumer, and other contingencies, was £16 ls. 9d. Deducting from that the sum of £1 19s. 8d., the value of 17 lbs. of stalks, there remained £14 2s. 1d. Dividing this by 69 lbs. of segars, it would be found to represent a payment in duty of something like 4s. 1d. per lb. He proposed to allow 5s., in order that the labourers who were employed in the manufacture, amongst whom were women and children, might be well looked after. His real difficulty, therefore, was not to defend the 5s. duty against those Gentlemen who thought it ought to be increased, but against those who, in the interest of a rigid free trade, considered it ought to be diminished. He would now take the extreme example of Havannah tobacco. This might be stated to contain about 23 per cent of moisture, and therefore a case most unfavourable for his purpose. He had heard of cases of 24 and 25 per cent of moisture, but no case of that kind had been strictly verified. The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets asked what was moisture? He did not know whether the House was capable of appreciating the process by which the moisture of any given article was ascertained; but there was, or used to be, at the Kensington Museum, a very interesting-looking vessel, the inscription on which set forth that it contained the constituent elements of the human body; and, as far as he recollected, out of 150 or 160 parts into which the whole was divided there were 110 or 112 parts of moisture. [An hon. MEMBER: Oh! more than that.] He hoped the hon. and learned Member would take up the moisture question on his behalf. It was true that many of those for whom the hon. and learned Member spoke knew little about the moisture in their tobacco. It often happened, that when a trade lived under the warm shelter of protection, and secure of monopoly, those engaged in the trade were not driven to ascertain the minute particulars of the trade they carried on. But taking the extreme case of Havannah—here at all events the amount of moisture could be ascertained by chemical analysis. Allowing, then, 23 per cent for moisture and a corresponding amount of stalks the case would stand thus:—100 lbs. of Havannah leaf of the wettest description contained 23 lbs. of moisture, 18 lbs. of stalks, and 2 lbs. of refuse, smalls, and waste. It followed that there were 43 lbs. to be deducted from the 100 lbs.; which left 57 lbs. of segars to be got out of the 100 lbs. But then the 18 lbs. of stalks sold for 2s. 4d. the lb.; and making the calculation and allowances as before, the result showed that the duty which the manufacturer paid on 57 lbs. of segars was £13 19s. 9d., or 4s. 10½d., or say in round numbers, 4s. 11d. per lb. Perhaps it would be said this was running it rather close, and that in the extreme case 5s. did not cover the manufacturer. That remark would be true but for one element in the calculation, which he had not yet presented to the House. In the calculations made it was assumed that the segars were perfectly dry; but the ordinary state of foreign segars imported into this country was that they contained 16¼ per cent moisture; and British segars, made from Havannah leaf, contained 15½ per cent of moisture. The consequence was that the duty of 5s. gave the home manufacturer the whole advantage of 15½ per cent of moisture in every 100 lb. of tobacco. The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets had made himself the mouthpiece of persons who stated that one good and profitable mode of making segars was to take tobacco of a certain description, and to reduce it one-half its weight, and that such was the process pursued on the Continent. Such, said the hon. and learned Member, was the extraordinary nature of tobacco leaf that it was capable of being increased or diminished in weight 100 per cent. That statement was made on a former evening, but it had not been repeated to-night. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) had been given to understand, in his own room, that if you brought down 2 lb. of tobacco to 1 lb. you would get a good tobacco; but then the argument he founded upon that alleged fact was that the British manufacturer was entitled to a 6s. 4d. countervailing duty. Of course, you might reduce paper one-half or more by burning it, and so you might reduce meat more than one-half by burning it to a coal. Would the hon. and learned Member rise in his place and repeat what he said the other night on this subject? He would tell the hon. and learned Member, that if tobacco were reduced one-half in weight, there would remain nothing but a woody fibre—everything would have been taken from it that constituted tobacco, and no smoker would be induced to put it to his mouth. It was true that an insignificant trade in which reduction was adopted was carried on upon the Continent. For any reduction that could be effected by importers consistently with the making of a good merchantable article, British manufacturers would have an ample allowance in the 5s. duty upon foreign segars proposed by this Bill. That duty was proposed with the view of compensating the British manufacturer for everything that he had paid, and for all the pecuniary disadvantages he might have to incur in consequence of the law.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. AYRTON said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had made certain statements which he had no doubt were in the main correct, for they were arithmetical calculations based on certain given quantities of tobacco. But he (Mr. Ayrton) had also calculations made by Cope Brothers and Co., of Liverpool, and based on very much the same quantities as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had given, from which it resulted that out of 100 lbs. of tobacco there would remain 49½ lbs. of leaf, and that consequently the duty ought to be 5s. 7d., and not 4s. 1d., as the right hon. Gentleman had calculated. But, independently of this, there were many incidental points to be brought into the account as between the manufacturer in England and the manufacturer abroad, which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not taken into calculation. For instance, the duty on foreign segars at present was 9s. a pound. That was a prohibition, except as regarded the slave-made segars of Cuba, and the segars of the royal monopoly at Manilla. One of the great disadvantages under which the British manufacturer laboured in comparison with the foreign manufacturer was that the latter had frequently a monopoly of the market. The Havannah manufacturer, for instance, had so completely the control of the market, from the limited supply of the particular article he manufactured, that if the dealer in this country chose to purchase one box of the best, he was compelled to buy also one box of the second-best, and one box of the worst. The British dealer, on the other hand, was compelled to sell the inferior article separately and at a great loss. Now, this was an important incident, because if the English manufacturer could only sell the first quality at a profit, and the inferior qualities at a loss, the amount of duty became a large figure. Again, the longer a segar was kept the less moisture it contained, and the more valuable it became. The foreigner would be able to keep his segar in bond, and the less moisture it contained the better it would be for him, as he only paid duty upon the weight; whereas in the case of the English manufacturer, the more the loss of moisture the greater the loss to him, because he had paid duty upon the moisture. He must charge a higher price on the residue, in order to cover that loss. The more the value of the commodity rose to the foreigner, the greater was the relative loss to the English manufacturer. These were serious elements, because, when they came to close competition, they had to be taken into account. With regard to the process of steeping, what he (Mr. Ayrton) said was, that in an extreme case it could be shown that tobacco lost half its weight, and he contended that in a question of duties and equivalents they must have regard to extreme cases, and for this reason:—That if a man had a commodity, though it were a woody fibre, it was still a fibre of tobacco wood, that could be used to mix for the purpose of keeping up the bulk, and at the same time of diminishing the weight of segars. They had positive experience with regard to the steeping process in the class of segars known as Swiss or Vevay segars. These segars were imported, and could pay a duty of 9s. They were made of steeped tobacco, and when weighed against tobacco of the same sort manufactured in this country, it turned out that there were 240 segars in the pound of those imported, and only 120 in the pound of those made in this country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said this was an extravagant case; but it was still a case of business actually going on, and such was the gain to the continental manufacturer resulting from this process of steeping, that he could actually make his segars pay a 9s. duty and yet exhibit them for sale. Nevertheless, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that a 5s. duty was sufficient. That was an important question—for this reason, that having established a prohibitory duty except as regarded Havannah and Manilla segars, it had been the interest of the manufacturer to keep up his weight, because upon his weight he had paid duty; and there being no such obligation on the foreigner, he could reduce the specific gravity as much as possible, and get the largest bulk for the smallest amount of duty; and if the foreigner could do this to an enormous extent in one class of segars—the Vevay segars—what would the industry of Germany do when it came to treat tobacco under the new regulations? Why, every class of tobacco would be subject, to a greater or less extent, to this steeping process, and the English manufacturer would be driven out of the market. The gain to the foreigner would be enormous. In the first place, he could use a coarse tobacco which the English manufacturer could not use, because it was too coarse, and thus he gained fourpence per lb. on the mere value or cost price of the tobacco. That was a subject which the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to consider. When they dealt with revenue, they were bound to regard extreme cases, otherwise those extreme cases might be used for turning the scale of the market. Now, he asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to put a clause in his Bill which would place the English manufacturer on exactly the same footing as the foreigner as to the steeping of tobacco in bond. If he would do that, he would admit he was dealing with his argument in a practical way. The right hon. Gentleman had not dealt with another question inseparably connected with this, for which he was bound to make provision. The English manufacturer was obliged to buy his tobacco with the stem in it, for which he paid duty; but the foreigner took out the stem before he paid any duty. On what principle could that be justified? He would ask the right hon. Gentleman to allow the tobacco to be stemmed in bond, and thus to place the English manufacturer in the same position as the foreigner. He wanted to hear upon what principle it was that the manufacturer in this country was not allowed to export his segars? Let the Chancellor of the Exchequer answer that on the principles of free trade. The English manufacturer was compelled to take in his tobacco, and make his segars, and then he was not allowed to send them out unless he paid as much duty as amounted to a positive prohibition. Facility for exporting segars would be the greatest possible relief to the English manufacturer, because he could sell very fine segars to gentlemen of fortune in England, and send out the coarser qualities to the people in the colonies, who were not so nice.

Mr. Ayrton

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the hon. and learned Gentleman had asked him several pointed questions, and had at the same time indulged in vague statements and been very shy of matters of fact and computation. The extreme case, as he had called it, of tobacco being reduced, by steeping, 50 per cent, did not exist, and was impossible. It was not in the nature of the tobacco plant that it should exist. A good merchantable segar could not be made in that way. As to the inquiry whether he would introduce a clause into the Bill for steeping in bond, he had to state, that having seen the hon. and learned Gentleman's constituents and other manufacturers of tobacco from Liverpool, Ireland, and Scotland, not one of them had made the slightest reference to the subject; and therefore there was no prima facie case for such a thing. With regard to the Swiss segars, they were told that by some wonderful hocus-pocus a Swiss manufacturer could make 240 out of a pound of tobacco, and the English manufacturer could only make 120. Why, he should think that in England, if they knew how to bisect them, they might make nearly 240, though not quite. The Swiss segars had been examined, and, instead of having been reduced one-half, according to the plausible and bold statement put forward, they had only 20 per cent taken out, and 80 parts of the old plant remained. With regard to the clause suggested, if it was a matter of extensive interest, it was a fair subject for consideration; but as it had never before been raised, it was impossible for him to give a pledge at the present moment. The hon. and learned Gentleman had stated that there was no allowance for stems in bond. That was to be considered in two points of view; and when they came to the question of drawback he would give an answer upon the subject. He would not enter upon it now, because the argument was as to segars, with which it had no connection whatever. The hon. and learned Member asked why they did not permit segars to be exported. He answered that they did permit segars to be exported. The importer brought 100lbs. of leaf into this country. In the manufacture he took out a certain quantity of stalks, and a small amount of absolute waste. He paid 3s. and 5 per cent, and they gave him back 3s. 3d. upon every pound of segars, and upon every pound of stalks manufactured in this country. His belief was that that came as near to a fair and sufficient drawback upon the manufacture of tobacco in general as could be calculated; but, at the same time, he admitted frankly that it was not possible so to construct a system of drawback as to make it cover everything that might be quoted in the nature of an extreme case.

He certainly should hope that the export of segars would be a profitable business, and that a great stride would be given to it by the new enactment as compared with the present state of the law. The quotation of the hon. and learned Gentleman from Mr. Cope was perfectly fallacious. In that statement it appeared that 49½lbs. of segars were the proceeds of 100lbs. of Havannah leaf. He wanted to ask if those 49½lbs. were dry or not—was all the moisture taken out of them? [Mr. AYRTON: They are dry.] Dry was a relative term. What was the meaning of it? Did Mr. Cope mean that the moisture had been taken out of that tobacco or that it had not?

Mr. AYRTON said, the statement explained itself. It meant 49½lbs. of marketable segars.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that if it was 49½lbs. of marketable segars, his answer was that the computation was wholly fallacious, because it was made upon an extravagant supposition (the fact never having happened) that the whole of the moisture had been taken out of the segars; whereas in marketable segars from Havannah there was 15½ per cent of moisture; and thus came to grief the calculation of Mr. Cope and his hon. and learned Friend.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he should like to know how the sudden conversion of the Irish trade had been effected. In the afternoon they were by no means satisfied with the answers they had received from the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but as they had now disappeared from the lobby, he supposed that by some means they were appeased. He wished particularly to know what provision would be made for providing bonded warehouses in various small towns in Ireland through which tobacco manufacturers were dispersed. If small manufacturers were not to be allowed the advantage of bonded warehouses, it would, in fact, ruin their business. He also wished to know the reasons which had induced the Chancellor of the Exchequer to deal in the manner he had with cavendish tobacco.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would explain the provisions for bonding at a future stage. It had been arranged with the Irish manufacturers that the duty on sweetened British tobacco should be 4s. instead of 3s. 8d., and on foreign tobacco of the same description 4s. 6d. instead of 4s. It was possible that the Irish part of the deputation which waited on him last night might have been dissatisfied with the tone of the discussion ; but he begged to inform the hon. and gallant Gentleman that upon questions like this he had always taken care to obtain the assistance of some of the officers of the Revenue Department conversant with the matter ; and having heard the statement of the deputation and advanced all the objections which struck him, it was his custom to debate the matter with the revenue officers before he came to the conclusion as to what step should be taken. That course had been pursued upon the present occasion, with what result the hon. and gallant Gentleman had seen. It would have been very wrong if, until he had an opportunity of talking the matter over, he had made the concessions there appeared to be fair ground for. The general rule in the tobacco trade at home, and, he believed, in foreign countries—certainly in France—was to allow the admixture of no foreign material excepting water. There had grown up in this country, notwithstanding this prohibition, a taste for a particular kind of sweetened tobacco. The question was whether this taste should be supplied in the irregular manner it was at present through the medium of smuggling, or by allowing the general sweetening of tobacco of all descriptions, or by distinguishing the ordinary manufactured tobacco from the sweetened cavendish. He thought the prohibition of cavendish would act as a stimulus to smuggling. Neither could he allow that the use of sweetening matter should be generally permitted. For he could not recommend the House to adopt provisions in the revenue law which he had been told by the executors of that law would be impracticable. Then came the question, what they were to do with cavendish ? The anxiety of the Irish manufacturers was—if you will not permit us to use sweetening materials in the manufacture of British cavendish and of the roll tobacco, then take care you make the sweetened cavendish a great deal dearer than the roll tobacco, so that the two may stand upon tolerably fair terms. This was the demand to which he had acceded.

Mr. AYRTON said, seeing that the statements made by the trade through him were denied by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the whole matter must rest upon his responsibility. It was useless to prolong the discussion. He suggested, however, that as moisture had been made an element with regard to the duty on tobacco, the same principle should be applied to segars, and that high-dried segars should be subject to a duty in excess of 5s.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was not aware of the existence of a class of segars to which the principle could be applied. The importer from Havanna now paid 9s. upon segars containing 16½ per cent of moisture. He was not likely to be anxious to spoil his segars by reducing the moisture when the duty was only 5s. If a distinction were introduced, it must be by reducing segars which were not high-dried ; but he did not believe there was any difference.

In reply to Mr. BUTT,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that it was absolutely necessary in the working of the bonded system to hold the manufacturer responsible for the acts of his servants. At the same time, it would not be competent to any common informer to inform against a breach of the revenue laws. All informations must be laid by the revenue officers.

COLONEL DUNNE reminded the right hon. Gentleman that he had not answered his question with respect to warehouses in Ireland.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that it was not intended to confine bonded warehouses to ports or large towns, but to place them where urgently required. At the same time, he should give no pledge with respect to establishing them in any particular district.

MR. CHILDERS suggested, that the allowance for waste, instead of being left to the discretion of officers of the Revenue Department, should be made upon fixed rules.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER approved of the suggestion, and altered the clause to the effect that such allowance should be made according to rules laid down by the Commissioners of Customs.

Clause amended, and agreed to ; as were the remaining Clauses.

House resumed.

Bill reported ; as amended, to be considered on Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 66.]

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS

BILL—[BILL 8.]—COMMITTEE.

(Progress 2nd March.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 8 (Evidence of Witness on Election Committee, and before Commission).

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that on the last discussion of this Bill he had been strongly pressed to consent to an alteration in the indemnity, so as to make it absolute instead of dependent upon the pleasure of the Committee or Commission. He had since consulted with the Attorney and Solicitor General, and as they saw no objection he had agreed to make the alteration. It was only fair that the witness should answer every question addressed to him; and if he did, under the provision he now proposed the Committee or Commission would have no choice, but would be bound to give him a certificate. Of course, if the witness perjured himself, an indictment would lie against him. He therefore proposed, in line 40, to leave out from "and" to "examined" in page 4, line 4, inclusive, and insert—

"Provided always, That where any witness shall answer every question relating to the matters aforesaid, which he shall be required by such Committee or Commissioners (as the case may be) to answer, and the answer to which may criminate, or tend to criminate him, he shall be entitled to receive from the Committee, under the hand of their clerk, or from the Commissioners, under their hands (as the case may be), a certificate stating that such witness was, upon his examination, required by the said Committee or Commissioners to answer questions or a question relating to the matters aforesaid, the answers or answer to which criminated or tended to criminate him, and had answered all such questions or such question."

MR. BUTT said, that the clause as proposed to be amended by the right hon. Gentleman made the protection depend entirely upon a person obtaining a certificate from the Commissioner, and upon his answering not merely a question tending to criminate himself, but upon answering all questions that might be put to him. He (Mr. Butt) thought, that when a question had been extorted from a man which tended to criminate himself, the indemnity should be complete and unconditional, and not made to depend upon anything he might do hereafter. He should therefore propose to insert in the clause a proviso to this effect—

"Provided always, That when any person shall be compelled under the provisions of this Act to give, and shall give, any answer criminating or tending to criminate himself, such person shall not at any time thereafter be liable to any indictment, prosecution, or penal action, for or in respect of any act or matter by him done or committed before his examination, in connection with any election forming the subject of such inquiry, for which he might have been prosecuted or proceeded against under such Acts."

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, he had placed a verbal Amendment on the paper, much shorter in its terms than that of the hon. Member for Youghal (Mr. Butt), but intended to effect the same object.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the effect of the Amendment proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Youghal would be that a man having answered one single question which criminated himself, he would be indemnified, not only against the consequences of that answer, but also against proceedings in respect of all corrupt practices in which he might have been concerned at the election. Now, he thought that would open the door to great fraud, and, in fact, defeat the object of the Bill. The purpose of the Bill would be frustrated unless the Commissioners were vested with a discretion as to granting their certificate to a witness who prevaricated, or made but a partial and incomplete disclosure of facts within his knowledge.

MR. LYGON said, he had given notice of a Motion to strike out the clause, but the Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman had entirely removed all his objections, and therefore he had very great pleasure in withdrawing his proposed Motion.

MR. COLLINS hoped the hon. Member for Youghal (Mr. Butt) would not press his Amendment.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, that the right hon. Baronet had had the courtesy to give him an opportunity of considering the proposed Amendment, which seemed to him—although as to terms it might have been framed more accurately for the purpose it was intended to effect—substantially to meet the whole of the difficulties—and they were numerous—that had existed in regard to a clause providing, that when a witness compelled, contrary to the constitutional rule, to criminate himself by answering the questions put to him, it should be left in the discretion of the tribunal before which he appeared to determine whether he should be protected or not.

MR. BUTT having intimated that under these circumstances he would not propose his Amendment—

Amendment agreed to.

SIR GEORGE GREY then proposed a further Amendment, to insert, at page 4, line 6, after the word "Acts," the words "or for which he might have been prosecuted or proceeded against under such Acts."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. HUNT said, he thought this clause would bear hardly upon candidates and sitting Members, who did not stand in the same position as other witnesses. A sitting Member might be summoned by an adverse party to give evidence, and by his own testimony alone he might be made to forfeit his seat. That was a dilemma in which he ought not to be placed. He therefore moved the addition of the following words:—

"Provided also, That nothing in this section contained shall apply to the case of any sitting Member or defeated candidate called as a witness before any election committee.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he regretted the hon. Member had not given notice of his Amendment. It involved an important principle, and at present he could not support it. The exemption of Members, he thought, would be most invidious.

MR. BUTT said, with his present feeling he should be prepared to support the proviso. The object of the Bill was to protect from penal consequences those who gave evidence; but if the man against whom the petition was presented were unseated on his own evidence, they did not protect him against the penal consequences. He did not wish to expose a man to the terrible temptation of saying what was untrue, and as far as he could see at present he was inclined to support the Amendment. He suggested that the proviso should be withdrawn now, and proposed again on bringing up the Report.

SIR FITZROY KELLY thought it would be very invidious and unjust to exempt Members from the extraordinary and unconstitutional liability which it was deemed expedient to impose on the rest of the community. He likewise believed that the proviso in itself would be almost nugatory, as it would be impossible for any Member to defend his seat if he refused to answer any proper question addressed to him, on the ground that it might criminate himself.

MR. COLLINS said, the question involved was one of great magnitude, and should not be discussed without previous notice. He hoped his hon. Friend would consent to defer his proposal to a future stage.

Mr. Butt

MR. AYRTON denied that an investigation before an Election Committee was a penal proceeding; it was a mere contention for a civil right, as a lawsuit for an estate would be, though the defeated party would necessarily be sensible of the loss. He hoped hon. Members would continue to be examined as they had been, for he must say the effect of personal examination had very often been to enable Members to keep their seats by clearing themselves of any personal knowledge of bribery, where without such testimony the evidence would have led the Committee directly to the conclusion that bribery had been committed.

MR. SERJEANT PIGOTT said, he trusted the Amendment would be withdrawn. So far from protecting themselves from answering these questions, if any exception were made, it ought to be the other way, and they should rather incline to the side of severity than indulgence. A Member of Parliament owed more to the Constitution than any mere private voter.

MR. CHILDERS said, that there was another reason for withdrawing the Amendment, and that, was that it placed the elected in a better position than the elector. The elector was compelled to answer, and if he were proved guilty of bribing, or being bribed, was liable to be struck off the register: a Member refusing to answer should be liable to lose his seat.

MR. LYGON hoped the question, which was one of importance, would not be prejudiced by a hasty decision. He thought they should fix some time for its special consideration.

MR. DENMAN said, he thought the hon. Member ought not only to withdraw the proviso, but never to introduce it again, either on the Report or at any other stage. If such a proviso were seriously attempted to be introduced into the Bill, the country would never believe they were in earnest, as he believed they were, in their endeavours to put down bribery.

MR. HUNT said, that in moving the proviso he had no intention of giving Members any advantage over the rest of the community. He only desired to give them the same rights as any other witnesses examined before an Election Committee. But after such an expression of opinion as he had heard he would not press his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 9 (Regulations for Election Committees).

MR. LYGON put it to the Secretary of State whether it would not be well to leave out those words of the clause which referred to treating, on the ground that he believed it was impossible to conceive an election in which there would not be some cases of treating. Treating was very much a question of degree. By that clause the mere giving of a glass of beer to a voter would bring the candidate, if the act were traced to any of his agents, within the penal enactments of the measure. He moved to omit the first paragraph of the clause.

SIR GEORGE GREY supported the clause as it stood. No doubt treating was a matter of degree. There might be a small amount of treating, but there might be extensive treating. The Committee had unanimously recommended that the proof of agency with regard to treating should be placed on the same footing as the proof of agency with regard to bribery. In some cases that had been brought before the House, the treating was so extensive as to be merely another form of bribery.

MR. LYGON observed, that a bribe was a bribe, and when once given and taken there was no doubt of the character of it; but it was a question whether giving a glass of beer was treating. He thought they ought not to take evidence of treating until they had established the connection between the sitting Member and the acts complained of.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said the hon. Gentleman seemed to think that the clause made it incumbent on Election Committees to receive evidence of treating before proof of agency was offered. But he did not read the clause in that way. It would, he thought, be in the discretion of the Committee, according to the circumstances of the case, to receive evidence of acts of treating independently of any proof of agency. The clause merely said it should not be necessary to prove agency in the first instance, before giving in evidence the facts whereby the charge of treating was to be sustained.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY suggested the insertion of the words "unless the Committee shall otherwise decide."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. CHILDERS proposed to extend the operation of the clause to cases of undue influence.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 10 (Prosecutions for Bribery) agreed to.

Clause 11 (Suspension of Writs).

MR. COLLINS moved an Amendment, to leave out "House of Commons resolves," and insert "the Houses of Parliament separately resolve." The suspension of the writ by a Vote of the House of Commons alone was an infringement of the prerogative of the Crown and the privilege of the House of Lords.

SIR GEORGE GREY pointed out, that as the powers would be exercised under an Act of Parliament which had received the sanction of the House of Lords and the assent of the Crown, there would be no infringement either of the privileges of the House of Lords or of the prerogative of the Sovereign. If the concurrence of the two Houses was required, the House of Commons might, if the assent of the Lords was refused, be tempted to suspend the writ during the continuance of the Parliament. This power, he thought, was open to abuse, and he should be glad to see it abolished.

MR. LYGON said, he had always voted against the suspension of writs; for he could never understand why innocent voters should be deprived of their rights because a number of other electors had been guilty of malpractices. It seemed to him that the clause unduly restricted the prerogative of the Crown, and he should therefore propose the omission of the clause altogether.

MR. SERJEANT PIGOTT observed, that if the concurrence of the other House were required to the suspension of a writ, the consent of the Crown would also be necessary. If an Act of Parliament gave the House of Commons the power, he did not see why they should hesitate to accept it. There would be little fear of their misusing it.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he could not support the Amendment, as he did not think the House of Lords should be permitted to interfere directly or indirectly with elections of Members to serve in the House of Commons. Looking, however, at the clause as a whole, giving power to suspend writs for a period of five years, which might extend beyond the duration of the Parliament, he thought there was matter worthy of further consideration.

Mr. CLAY wished to know whether the clause would supersede the ordinary Parliamentary right of suspending a writ; and whether, if a writ were once suspended for five years, that term could be afterwards shortened if the circumstances should seem to justify it?

Mrs. GEORGE GREY said, the Bill contained an express provision that it should not affect the right of Parliament to alter or suspend the right of voting of all or any of the electors in any place for which the writ was suspended. It gave power to suspend a writ for five years absolutely, even though the House should not continue in being so long; and when once a writ had been suspended under this clause for five years, there was no power to shorten the period.

Mr. BENTINCK protested against the unconstitutional suspension of writs proposed by the clause. It was well known that when a Motion for suspending a writ was brought forward it was turned into a party question, and that the issue or non-issue of the writ depended entirely upon whether the constituency whose bribery was in question would return Members in favour of the majority in the House.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. J. J. POWELL (Gloucester) moved the omission of the clause, with the view of substituting for it a clause of which he had given notice. He did this because he believed the clause to be unjust and unnecessary, and because he believed that, with all its unnecessary injustice, it would be found inoperative to produce the good result expected from it. Unless the clause was absolutely necessary, its injustice was so palpable that he did not propose to detain the Committee at any length by exposing it. What the Committee was asked to do was in effect this:—That whenever a Commission of Inquiry should report that in a constituency, say of 2,000 voters, they had discovered, after diligent scrutiny, some 200 or 300 of those voters were habitually corrupt, the House should disfranchise the whole 2,000, for the sake of punishing or purifying the 200 corrupt persons. Such a proposition was so monstrous that it must strike everybody with conviction that nothing but the sternest necessity could justify it; and he therefore passed on to consider whether it was necessary. Now, it could easily be demonstrated that it was not necessary. What was the object of their legislation on this subject? He presumed it was to purify, and not to disfranchise, the constituencies. And how could they best purify without disfranchising them? Why clearly by excluding from them the corrupt members. But how were they to find them out? Why, they would be already found out and reported to them by name by the very Commissioners and the very Report on which the House was asked, because of those corrupt persons, to disfranchise also the best and worthiest members of their community. But then, it might be said, how could they rely on the Report of those Commissioners? how could they know that they had fully inquired and faithfully reported? The answer was first of all, whether they knew it or not, the Bill proposed to rely on their Report to disfranchise not a part only but the whole of the community; and secondly, that all experience of these Commissions and Commissioners authorized them to place implicit confidence in them. They were gentlemen of great experience, they were armed with all the powers necessary for inquiry, and he had never heard a doubt suggested as to their perfect impartiality. Several witnesses examined before the Committee, in 1860, gave their testimony on this subject. One of them, who had been secretary to several Commissions said, "I think they always get at the truth," and strongly recommended, that instead of the present system of trying petitions by Committees, they should be tried by Commissioners on the spot, which it was shown would be a much more effective and a much less expensive method of procedure than by Committee. When a Commission of this kind visited any place, the whole constituency was put upon its trial. If any one had anything to allege against the purity of the place generally, or of any electors in particular, he was at liberty to state it. The persons accused were sent for, heard in their own defence and by their witnesses, and might in their turn accuse others, who would have to go through the same process. The Commissioners then reported that certain persons named had been guilty of corrupt practices ; and in their schedule they included every person against whom the evidence of guilt was deemed sufficient. It was material to observe that they arrived at this result, in a great measure, through the assistance rendered to them by the honest portion of the community. Gentlemen who were disgusted at the corrupt practices which had prevailed at and disgraced the place they resided in, rendered the Commissioners all the information and assistance in their power, and thus enabled them to get at the truth. The inquiries of the Commissioners were thus made very searching, and the result was that the House knew who the corrupt persons were, and knew also that substantially all the rest of the community were not corrupt. The necessity, therefore, which could alone justify disfranchising a whole constituency did not exist. Moreover, this provision, like other things of its kind, would nullify itself by reason of its injustice. At present they had in their favour all the honest men in the community—such men were equally interested with the House in getting rid of the corrupt, and did all they could to assist in doing so. But how would this clause operate ? Why, it would give every honest man the same interest as the rogue in concealing corrupt practices. How could they expect a man to expose the offences of others, when he was himself to be punished for them ? He wondered what result the right hon. Gentleman would expect from an enactment to the effect, that it being necessary to put down bribery and corruption, every person reported as guilty of those offences should receive a certain number of lashes, and then going on to enact, that it being extremely desirable that such persons should be brought to justice, every honest man who would give such information as should lead to the conviction of offenders should receive precisely the same punishment. [A laugh.] They laughed at that as absurd, but in principle it was precisely what the right hon. Gentleman proposed to do. It might be said, that a great evil existed, and something must be done. To this he replied, adopt the natural and just course of disfranchising those, and those only, who deserved disfranchisement. If difficulties were objected, let them examine them. It might be said, that as these Commissions were not part of the ordinary tribunals of the country, it would be unsafe to deprive a man of his franchise simply upon their Report. It might also be said that to do so would be a breach of the certificate of indemnity given to those who made a full disclosure before the Commissioners. A short examination would show the fallacy of those objections. First of all, if they were objections, they were as much so to the Government clause as to that which he would substitute for it ; for as they were going to disfranchise all upon the Report of a Commission, it could not be more objectionable to disfranchise a portion only on the same Report. As to the exceptional character of the Commission, that might be easily provided against by giving a power of appeal under proper restrictions ; and as to the certificates of indemnity, the Government proposed to disfranchise those who had them as much as he did, and in fact, if they did not, the only persons who could be disfranchised would be those innocent persons who had not got, because they had never needed, certificates of indemnity. Surely the guilty would not be the less disfranchised because the innocent were disfranchised with them ; and surely the legislature, when it passed the indemnity clause, never contemplated that it should be not only a shield from the consequences of past offences, but a licence to commit the like offences for the future ? He was aware the right hon. Gentleman contended that he was not introducing a new principle, and that the law of making a community responsible for the misconduct of individuals was of very ancient origin, and was still in existence. But surely there was no analogy between making a hundred responsible for the damage done by rioters, and making the inhabitants responsible criminally and subjecting them to the same punishment as the rioters whom they had vainly tried to resist. And if the right hon. Gentleman wished to revert to the rude or simple legislation of our Saxon ancestors, which made every tithing man responsible for the good conduct of every other man in the tithing, let him at least accompany it with the wise and just proviso which characterized the Saxon law—namely, that if a man could purge himself of the offence by proving that he was no party to it, he should not be amerced for it. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving the omission of the clause ; and said if it were carried, he would propose a clause for disfranchising such persons as a Commission should report to have been guilty of corrupt practices.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly

MR. KNIGHTLEY said, he should vote for the omission of the clause, because he thought the penalty under it was not sufficient. There were certain places, that were very well known, that ought to be disfranchised altogether.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, there was nothing in this clause which would prevent Parliament disfranchising any place where corruption was almost universal. It was intended to meet those cases in which, although corruption was extensive, there might be a majority who were not corrupt. The principle was this:—To enable the House, if it thought bribery had been so extensive as to call for a temporary suspension of the writ, to act upon the whole community of electors, and therefore create an interest in preventing corruption altogether. It was true that in some cases, where Commissions had reported extensive bribery, acts of corruption had not been proved against one third of the individual electors. But it was impossible to read the Reports without seeing that countenance had been given to bribery by persons not engaged in it. It was clearly impossible to prevent corrupt practices being carried on if this clause were altered so as not to affect the whole community. It did not follow that in every case the House would support the Resolution. If a large proportion of the electors appeared to have taken steps to prevent bribery, it would be competent to the House to abstain from doing so. They would simply have the power, wherever there was proof of the corruption of a number of electors, and connivance or indifference on the part of the rest. His hon. and learned Friend proposed to deal only with individual electors; that individual electors guilty of bribery should be struck off the poll, and that where the proof before the Commission was not conclusive an appeal should be had to the Court of Queen's Bench. Upon what ground was it persons were reported guilty of bribery? Upon their own evidence, subject to the indemnity to which they were entitled; and the Bill declared that such evidence should not be used in any court of law. If therefore persons came before a Commission and declared their own corruption, and were reported to be guilty of bribery, they would have nothing to do but appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench; and if an issue were tried, the evidence upon which the Commission reported would be excluded, and they would be, by an easy process, restored to the franchise. He hoped the House would retain the clause in its integrity, which he believed would have a very beneficial effect.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that if the hon. and learned Gentleman had been returned for Gloucester free from any taint of corrupt practices, it was a clear proof of the beneficial influence of suspending a writ. If any appeal were given, it must be to the County Courts, for the expense of the Queen's Bench would deter those electors who wished to adopt that very certain mode of being restored to the register. He thought that where corruption existed to a considerable extent without affecting the character of a borough, there should be some minor punishment short of total disfranchisement, and that some time for suspension should be fixed. He thought that in fixing five years the Committee had not gone too far.

MR. HENLEY wished to know whether the Resolution of one Parliament was to bind another, and whether the House of Commons was to have the power to make a hard and fast bargain which might extend over two or three Parliaments? It would be a very strong proceeding. He could quite understand resolving that during their own life-time they would suspend the issue of any writ; but he was not aware of any precedent for giving to a Resolution of that House the power of law, and he thought that if they wanted to go beyond the Parliament in existence when the Resolution was passed, they should have the sanction of the other House, and of the Queen. Without reference to the merits of this case, it was a serious thing to make a precedent for giving to a simple Resolution of one House in one Parliament the power of effecting certain things after the Parliament itself had come to an end, either by efflux of time or dissolution by the Crown.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the House now had power to suspend a writ during the existence of the Parliament in which the Resolution was passed, and this Bill would give legislative sanction to suspension beyond a dissolution, so long as it did not exceed five years.

MR. LYGON thought it a most dangerous precedent to delegate to this House the power to do by Resolution that which a separate Act of Parliament only could effect. Parties might be so balanced that one vote might determine the fate of a Government; and in case of an appeal to the constituencies it was very undesirable to deprive any constituency of the privilege of expressing an opinion upon the question on which the Crown resorted to the country for advice.

In reply to Mr. CHILDERS,

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that if the five years expired while Parliament was sitting, the writ would issue by Resolution of the House; and if the five years expired between a dissolution and the assembling of the new Parliament, by the authority of the Crown.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he must object to the clause. The ground on which he must resist the clause was, that although it was expedient that a Parliament should have the power of suspending a writ during its continuance, he did not understand why, for the offences of a small portion of a constituency, the House of Commons should have the power of encroaching on the prerogative of the Crown, and disfranchising, perhaps, a very meritorious portion of the constituency for a longer period than its own existence. He thought it highly inexpedient to give the House of Commons such a power to bind the whole Legislature for years to come.

MR. HUNT pointed out, that if the clause passed as it stood, the House of Commons might go on suspending the writ of a particular place, and then just at the end of the Parliament pass this Resolution; so that in effect the writ might be suspended for two Parliaments.

MR. BENTINCK said, that the right hon. Gentleman had not answered the question whether the effect of the clause would not be to enable one Session of Parliament to suspend a writ during part of a subsequent Session.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that clearly the effect of the clause would be that the suspension might extend over a future Parliament. The writ would be suspended, not by the action of the House of Commons, but by virtue of an Act of Parliament; and the House of Commons would be bound, by the Act, just in the same manner as all the other parties were.

MR. WALPOLE said, he was in favour of the clause, and thought it would be an improvement in the law, that instead of disfranchising a borough, which was the only punishment it was at present in the power of the House to inflict, they should have the power of suspending the writ. He thought that the five years might well run over a dissolution, for the constituency would be thereby warned, that if their evil practices were continued, they would be disfranchised altogether. Still he was of opinion that the clause required guarding, as he thought the Secretary of State would see from attention to two considerations. First, this suspension might be effected simply by a Resolution of the House, and there was no guard against the Resolution being taken at a distant sitting of Parliament; and he thought that in all cases the Resolution ought to be moved within one month after the date of the Report of the Committee. Secondly, the Resolution ought to be passed in a Committee of the Whole House, and for this reason, that the House might not be taken by surprise. The Report of the Committee would then be laid on the table, and the House would have an opportunity of confirming or of rescinding it.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE also thought the clause too general; for, as at present framed, the House of Commons, if it thought fit, might act on a Report several years old, even though a general election had intervened.

SIR GEORGE GREY allowed that there ought to be some limit in point of time, and said he would introduce words on the Report. As to the other point raised by the right hon. Gentleman, he scarcely thought that the practice of the House should be regulated by an Act of Parliament. It was rather a matter for the Standing Orders.

MR. HENLEY said, the many difficulties which had been raised about this clause only made it clearer that there was considerable danger in passing it. His right hon. Friend, who was in favour of it, could not harden his heart to the Resolution being passed at once, but wanted the House to have a second opportunity of considering it. It was suggested that the Resolution should be passed within a month of the presentation of the Report; but considering what thick blue-books these Reports generally made, it was hardly likely that many Members would be ready in that time to give their verdict. He saw great harm in enabling the House to do by Resolution that which had hitherto been done by the Legislature. It was a bad precedent, and might hereafter be used for drawing the whole power of Parliament into the House of Commons.

MR. PEACOCKE pointed out, that if this Resolution, which was to have force for five years, were passed at the beginning of a Parliament, and that Parliament lasted seven years, the writ would not be suspended for a whole Parliament.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that it was not intended necessarily to carry the suspension over a whole Parliament; but there would be a period of five years during which the place would be unrepresented.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY asked by whom the writ would be issued if the five years happened to expire when the House was not sitting.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the writ would issue in the usual manner, under the authority of the Act of Parliament.

MR. PEACOCKE said, he scarcely thought it was the intention of the right hon. Baronet to suspend the disfranchisement of a borough over a dissolution, and during part of a future Session.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that that was the intention, if it should be necessary. The object was that a constituency found guilty of malpractices should remain unrepresented during the full period of five years.

MR. KNIGHTLEY asked how the culpable electors were to be punished. A man received £10 for his vote; the writ was then suspended for five years, and before that Parliament was dissolved the writ would be issued and the same elector would have another opportunity of receiving another bribe.

SIR GEORGE GREY replied, that if the House saw fit, it might suspend the issue of the writ over the five years, or until the summoning of a new Parliament.

MR. J. J. POWELL said, he had heard no reason why the whole body of the electors in any borough should be disfranchised because a few were guilty of bribery, and he should therefore divide the Committee on the clause.

Question put, "That the clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 113; Noes 48: Majority 65.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 12 and 13.

MR. PACKE, with a view to prevent disorder at elections, proposed a new clause—(Treating), providing that every candidate who should directly or indirectly pay for any meat, drink, entertainment, or provisions for any person other than an elector, with a view to influence the election, on the nomination or the polling days, should be deemed guilty of treating and should forfeit £50; and that any person furnishing such meat, drink, or entertainment, should pay 40s., and, if an elector, be incapable of voting at such election.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the law as it stood afforded sufficient security against treating, and certainly thought the proposal of the hon. Member would be no improvement, but rather a change for the worse. A great portion of the proposed clause was unnecessary, as it merely re-enacted that which was provided by the present law. In fact, while the existing law was of a general character, prohibiting treating before the polling-day, on the polling-day, or after, the clause would limit the prohibition.

Clause negatived.

MR. PAGET moved a clause—(Persons who are under a Recognizance, or have been served with a Subpoena, not appearing, to be guilty of Contempt of Court).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL saw no reason in this particular case for departing from the ordinary practice or for making the offence in question a contempt of court.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY pointed out that the hon. Gentleman who moved the clause seemed to be of opinion that bribery was worse than murder, for the witness was to be subjected to a greater punishment for non-appearance.

Clause negatived.

MR. PAGET moved a new clause—(Judge of a Superior Court may order Trials to be held in the Central Criminal Court, or in a neighbouring County).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL opposed the clause, on the ground that no necessity for the proposed change in the practice of the law had been shown.

Clause negatived.

MR. PULLER moved a new clause to follow Clause 10—

"Any person who shall be convicted of bribery or undue influence at an Election, or against whom judgment shall have been obtained for any penal sum by the Corrupt Practices Prevention Acts made recoverable in respect of the offences of bribery, treating, and undue influence, or either of them, shall, in addition to any other punishment or forfeiture, be incapable of being elected or sitting in Parliament during the five years next after such conviction or judgment."

SIR GEORGE GREY: I am not disposed to object to this clause, which provides a temporary disqualification only on a conviction by a court of law.

Clause added to the Bill.

Mr. Peacocke

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID moved a clause (Votes for Candidates Guilty of Bribery thrown away). The object of the clause was, that where a candidate petitioned and claimed the seat and proved bribery against the sitting Member, such candidate should be declared the sitting Member, if no recriminating case of bribery could be proved against him. At present, unless such candidate could strike off so many of the voters of his opponent as would place him in a majority, he would not be entitled to the seat. All he could do was to stand again; but he would present himself under the disadvantage of having proved bribery amongst the constituency, and would stand a small chance of being returned. The effect of the clause proposed would be to make bribery defeat its own end, and as a consequence to diminish it throughout the country. The only objection he saw to his proposal was that it would give the seat to the person who represented the minority. But he thought that was a mere verbal objection, for the real majority consisted of those who honestly exercised the franchise.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that this was not the first time his hon. Friend had brought forward this proposition, nor the first time that he (Sir George Grey) had stated his objections to it. These objections remained unchanged. Votes could only properly be held to be thrown away where the disqualification of the candidate was patent and known to the electors. His hon. Friend's proposal struck directly at election by majority. Thus, if in a constituency of 3,000, the candidate elected had 2,000 votes, and the other candidate 1,000, and if the person elected was unseated for bribery through a single act committed by an agent, the candidate with the 1,000 votes would become the representative of the constituency. In such cases he thought that the electors, not having any knowledge that acts of bribery had been committed, should have an opportunity of again exercising their choice, and giving their votes for another candidate.

Clause negatived.

MR. HUNT moved the addition of a clause (Recovery of Cost by Member declared duly elected by unanimous Resolution of Committee), such Member to be entitled to recover from the petitioners against him his costs and expenses.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the Committee had at present a discretionary power to declare a petition frivolous and vexatious, and the petitioners then had to pay costs. He believed that arrangement was sufficient. It would be rather hard to inflict costs where a petition had been presented in good faith. The effect of the clause would probably be to discourage petitions, and would so far foster bribery. He thought it would be better to leave the law in that respect as it stood.

MR. BRADY held that costs ought to fall on whichever party lost the case.

MR. CLAY believed the effect of the proposed provision would be to deter parties from presenting petitions, even in the most justifiable cases.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, the objection to the clause was its want of mutuality. To make it complete, there ought to be also a provision that the sitting Member, if unseated, should be liable for costs. Even where there were strong grounds of suspicion, a petition might fail for want of technical evidence, and in such a case the petitioners ought not to be mulcted in the expenses of both sides.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH thought some provision of this sort was desirable.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the clause was out of order at that stage.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HUNT then moved the addition of a clause (Provision for Payment of Costs of Commission of Inquiry), providing that where any Commission issued to inquire into the extensive prevalence of bribery, or treating, or other corrupt practices, in any county or borough, shall report that such practices have extensively prevailed in such county or borough, the Commission of the Treasury shall certify to the Treasurer of such county or borough the total amount of the cost of the Commission; and the Treasurer shall within two years pay the same, the amount to be levied by a borough or county rate.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he would assent to the clause.

Clause agreed to.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH moved the insertion of a clause (Unlawful Payment of Travelling Expenses to be deemed Bribery).

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that in the framing of the Bill, interference with the subject of travelling expenses was studiously avoided. The law as it at present stood worked satisfactorily. The effect of the clause would be to declare that to be bribery which was not bribery.

Clause negatived.

Mr. CHILDERS rose to propose a clause (Provisions for Elections for Places for which Members have been unseated). The clause contained sections A to L constituting a code of provisions applicable to such cases. The hon. Member, in support of his clauses, said that in the great majority of instances bribery at elections was committed late in the afternoon on the day of polling. That arose from the circumstance that in the afternoon the votes of the several candidates were nearly equal, and electors held back their votes in order that they might become more valuable. He proposed a very simple remedy. He did not propose it with respect to all boroughs, but only such as had been affected by bribery. He proposed that in a constituency amongst which bribery had been committed, the state of the poll at all future elections should not be made known during the day. And he proposed to effect that in this manner:—Instead of a vote being given publicly, an elector, after he had satisfied the returning officer that he was entitled to vote, would receive a paper with the names of the candidates, to which would be attached the number of the elector on the register—that paper, which would indicate for whom the elector voted, would be put into a box, which at four o'clock would be opened, and immediately after four the returning officer would publish the votes in the most formal manner.

Clause (Provisions for Elections for Places for which Members have been unseated) brought up, and read 1°.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the clauses proposed by his hon. Friend were long and important enough to form a separate measure. He would not consent to their incorporation into the present Bill.

Question put, "That the Clause be read a second time."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 55; Noes 131: Majority 76.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Tuesday next [Bill 68].

TELEGRAPHS BILL.—[BILL 16.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Interpretation).

MR. HENLEY asked the meaning of the words "lands continuously built upon," which occurred in two paragraphs of this clause.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, they were inserted to define streets—which were "lands continuously built upon."

MR. HENLEY said, if the Committee could not understand the interpretation clause, they could not understand the clauses to which it referred. The words were very vague, and many questions would arise unless a clearer definition were given of them.

MR. BUTT said, the words had been judicially interpreted; that he knew of his own knowledge.

MR. HENLEY would be glad to hear the interpretation the words had received.

MR. BUTT referred to a case in which the city of Cork and a railway company were concerned, but he could not undertake to say what the decision was.

MR. HENLEY asked what the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade meant by these words?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, the words were plain English. He did not see how they could better define a street. The words were most reasonable. Did the right hon. Gentleman object to them?

MR. HENLEY said, he did not object to them, but he wanted them to be explained, clearly and properly.

Clause agreed to; as was also Clause 4.

Clause 5 (Provisions as to Notices and Consents).

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL proposed, after the third paragraph, to add a provision to the effect that after a company had given due notice of its intention to pass along a certain road, the absence of dissent in writing on the part of the proprietors on either side of such road should, after the lapse of fourteen days, be equivalent to their consent.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, the proposed concession would no doubt be very beneficial to the companies, and he at first thought it was one which might properly be granted. But, on further consideration, it had been thought better that the companies should incur the trouble of obtaining the express consent of the parties interested.

Proviso negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 (General Description of Works which a Telegraph Company may execute, subject to the restrictions of this Act).

Question, "That Paragraph 1 stand part of the Clause," put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. JACKSON proposed the insertion of words for the protection of water and gas pipes; he also objected to the sufficiency of the notices provided.

Whereupon Debate arising,

Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again," put, and agreed to.

House resumed:—Committee report Progress; to sit again on Monday next.

MUTINY BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. HENLEY asked if there was any change introduced by this Bill.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that in one sense there was a change, and in another sense there was no change. Instead of passing a separate Act for the European troops in India, the India clauses were incorporated in this Bill, and one or two minute differences were preserved in the incorporation that had been made. The Native troops in India were under a separate jurisdiction. There were no other changes in any of the clauses of the Mutiny Act.

Clauses 1 to 22, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 23 (Power to inflict Corporal Punishment).

MR. HENNESSY moved its omission.

Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 34; Noes 7: Majority 27.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

House resumed:—Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read 3^o To-morrow.

THAMES CONSERVANCY, &c.

SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

MR. HUTT moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the operation of the several Acts of Parliament relating to the Conservancy of the river Thames, to the buoyage, beaconage, and ballastage of that river, from Staines to Yantlet Creek, and to the regulation of vessels navigating or plying on the river within the aforesaid limits.

VOL. CLXIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed,

"To inquire into the operation of the several Acts of Parliament relating to the Conservancy of the River Thames, to the Buoyage, Beaconage, and Ballastage of that River from Staines to Yantlet Creek, and to the regulation of vessels navigating or plying on the River between the aforesaid limits."

And on Thursday, April 16, Committee nominated, as follow:—

MR. HUTT, The LORD MAYOR OF LONDON, SIR JOHN HANMER, MR. WESTERN WOOD, MR. JOSEPH EWART, MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS, MR. LONGFIELD, MR. LOCKE, MR. CAYE, MR. SOMES, MR. RICHARD HODGSON, MR. LINDBAY, MR. BLACKBURN, MR. SHAPTO, and MR. CUBITT.

VACCINATION (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Sir Robert Peel, Bill to further extend and make compulsory the practice of Vaccination in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by SIR ROBERT PEELE and MR. LOWE.

Bill presented, and read 1^o. [Bill 70.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT (1858) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Sir George Grey, Bill for amending the Local Government Act (1858), ordered to be brought in by SIR GEORGE GREY and MR. BRUCE.

Bill presented, and read 1^o. [Bill 69.]

JUDGMENTS LAW AMENDMENT (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Whiteside, Bill to further amend the Law concerning Judgments and Recognizances in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by MR. WHITESIDE and MR. GEORGE.

Bill presented, and read 1^o. [Bill 71.]

House adjourned at One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, March 20, 1863.

HARES (IRELAND) BILL.

Bill brought from Commons; read 1^o; and to be printed. (No. 52.)

CONSOLIDATED FUND (£10,000,000) BILL.

Bill read 2^o (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter past Five o'clock, to Monday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

*Friday, March 20, 1863.*MINUTES.]—REPORT—of Selection, Third Report [No. 47.]

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES—considered in Committee.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Roman Catholic Marriages Registration (Ireland) [Bill 73]; Office of Secretary at War Abolition [Bill 72]; Oaths Relief in Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) [Bill 74].

Committee—Marine Mutiny.

Third Reading—Trustees (Scotland) Act Amendment [Bill 59]; and passed.

CASE OF MARY BROPHY.

QUESTION.

MR. VANCE said, he rose to ask the President of the Poor Law Board a Question in regard to the removal of a pauper named Mary Brophy from the Marylebone Workhouse to the South Dublin Union. That pauper had stated to the authorities in Dublin that she entered the Marylebone workhouse five weeks previously in consequence of the illness of her child. About eight days ago she asked for her discharge, when the master said he would not grant it without her being passed to Ireland. She refused, and subsequently, when she was forced to leave the workhouse, a struggle took place between her and the officials who were forcing her off, in which her face was blackened, her shoulder put out of joint, and a strait waistcoat put upon her. She said she had been twenty-six years in London, and had two children in the Marylebone schools. Under these circumstances, he wished to ask, Whether, in the opinion of the President of the Poor Law Board, this was not clearly a cruel and illegal removal?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, in reply, that no communication had been made by the Irish Poor Law Commissioners to the Poor Law Board on the subject. The hon. Member had not given him full notice of the terms of his Question, and therefore he must defer answering it until he had had an opportunity of learning the facts.

MR. VANCE said, he would repeat the Question on Monday.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether the pauper had not been removed back from Ireland and received into the Marylebone workhouse, and whether that was not an acknowledgment of the illegality of the previous removal?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he had heard of the case, and he believed the facts were as the hon. Member had stated.

STATE OF THE COTTON TRADE.

QUESTION.

MR. FERRAND said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will give a Government night immediately after Easter, to bring under the notice of the House the present state of the Cotton Trade, and of half a million of Cotton Operatives living in unwilling idleness. As the case was one of extreme urgency, he hoped to have a favourable reply.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I can assure the hon. Member and the House that the subject to which his Question relates is one that must necessarily excite great anxiety in the mind of the Government, and we shall be anxious and desirous to give the House any opportunity that might be required for full consideration of the subject in any point of view. I believe that after Easter the two early Tuesdays are very much engaged; otherwise I should have said to the hon. Member that he would probably have found room on a Tuesday. But if he is anxious to bring the subject on earlier than he could by waiting for a Tuesday, I can assure him that, subject of course to due attention to pressing public business, we are willing to give him every facility that can be given to him for the consideration of the question.

PORTSMOUTH DOCKYARD.

QUESTION.

MR. LAIRD said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether he will have any objection to lay upon the table of the House any Plans, Reports, and Estimates which may have been laid before the Admiralty in reference to the proposed extension of Portsmouth Dockyard?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET replied, that together with any future Estimates which might be presented to the House for the extension of Portsmouth Dockyard, he trusted to be able to lay on the table plans connected with that work.

THE TRIALS AT SHOEBOURNE.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is true that in the trials at Shoeboorne on Tuesday last, 5½-inch iron plates were penetrated by Shells, and the wooden backing set on fire; and, if so, whether the Admiralty still intend to build of wood the five new Ships, to be plated with iron?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, in reply, that on Tuesday last some very important experiments took place, not only with the Armstrong shells but likewise with the Whitworth shells; and, undoubtedly, he might state that those shells pierced plates 5½ inches thick. It was, however, quite impossible to state the extent of the effect produced by the shells until the target was taken to pieces. He mentioned this circumstance, because last year, when experiments took place, the House was exceedingly anxious to learn the results; and being asked a question upon the following day, he made a statement on the subject, and afterwards he had occasion very much to modify his expressed opinion. Therefore, he wanted a complete examination of the target, in order to be able to give, if the House should desire it, a more accurate account than he could at present of the extent of the effect produced by the shells.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that the noble Lord had not answered a part of the Question put to him—namely, whether, as the wooden backing was set on fire and blazed up, that circumstance had any effect upon the intention of the Admiralty to build five new ships of wood?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he must beg pardon for omitting to answer that part of the Question; but he could state, that the Admiralty had not, in consequence of these experiments on Tuesday last, as at present advised, found it necessary or expedient to alter the opinions previously expressed by him as to the desirability of preparing some wooden frames of armour-plated ships in the course of the year.

POLAND—CASE OF M. ABICHT.

QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Russian Government recently applied to Her Majesty's Government for information respecting a Polish Refugee named Abicht; whether Her Majesty's Government complied with that application, and afforded information to the Russian Government; and whether this Polish Refugee is the individual referred to in a Letter of Earl Russell, dated Foreign Office, February 14, 1863, as "a person lately arrested in Poland as a political agent"?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: No application of any kind, Sir, has been addressed to Her Majesty's Government by the Government of Russia upon the subject of this man Abicht; and, of course, no answer or communication of any kind has been made by Her Majesty's Government to the Government of Russia on the subject. The history of this person was this:—In a despatch of the 11th January, from the Acting Consul at Warsaw, Her Majesty's Government were informed that a certain number of persons had been arrested, and that among them was a man of the name of Abicht, who, it was supposed, had been engaged in treasonable enterprises. On the 14th the Acting Consul wrote to us that Abicht was found to have been travelling with a British Foreign Office Passport, under the name of Brett, and that that Passport had been viséd and signed by different authorities on the way to Warsaw. Thereupon an inquiry was made at the Foreign Office, and it was found that a Passport had been issued to a person named Brett. Examination was made, and it was found that in July, 1861, an application was made by a Mr. Levenson, residing in St. Helen's in London, for a party of the name of Brett, whom he described as his confidential clerk, whom he wanted to send on business of his to the Continent, and that he was to go in company with another confidential clerk whose name I do not remember. Well, Mr. Levenson was asked by the letter to which the hon. Member refers, written by Lord Russell, how it happened that the Foreign Office Passport granted at his recommendation to his confidential clerk, Brett, should have fallen into other hands—had, in fact, got into the hands of the man Abicht, of whom the Foreign Office knew nothing whatever. Mr. Levenson replied from Paris that he thought the inquiry had better be addressed to Mr. Brett. Accordingly a letter was written to Mr. Brett, asking to know how his Passport got into other hands. But up to this time

Brett had not answered. He had a defective memory, no doubt; and not having duly posted up in his mind that the letter required an answer, he omitted to make any reply to that communication.

BRITISH MUSEUM ESTIMATES.

QUESTION.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he has made any arrangements for having the British Museum Estimates moved in the House by a Minister of the Crown?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, in reply, that the arrangement by which the British Museum Estimates were introduced and moved by a distinguished Member of the House—who was also a member of the governing body of the Museum—had not been considered by the Government with a view to change. It appeared to be an appropriate incident of the system, and had hitherto worked very well. It was not the intention of the Government to propose any change at present, but he was not prepared to say, that if the whole question of the government of the Museum were reconsidered, some such change might not be proposed.

THE WHITWORTH SHELL.—QUESTION.

MR. DALGLISH said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the authorities at the Admiralty intend to try the effect of Whitworth's shells on a target representing the side of the Royal Oak, or of one of the wooden ships which it is proposed to build; and also whether facilities will be afforded to hon. Members to witness those experiments?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, in reply, that undoubtedly it was the intention of the Government to carry out a series of experiments, with a view to test the merits of these shells, and likewise with respect to the wooden backing of the various classes of ships. He was not prepared at that moment to state what the particular course of the experiments would be; but he could only say that the Government intended to carry on the experiments that had been proceeding from day to day. With respect to the latter part of the hon. Gentleman's Question, he could only say, that when any Member of that House would do them the honour to be present on those occasions, he should be glad to furnish a card, and he was sure that the War Office would be glad to afford a similar facility.

Viscount Palmerston

ENGLISH POLICE IN POLAND.

QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, For the name of the Agent referred to in the following paragraph of the Russian Ambassador's Letter applying for the services of the English Police in Poland:—

“The first step to be taken should be to allow Sir Richard Mayne to put himself into communication with a gentleman to whose care the Grand Duke has directly and privately intrusted this object.”

And whether any money has been paid by the Russian Government to the English Police since the return of the latter from Warsaw?

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, I can only give the same answer that I gave the other night. The name of the person was never communicated to me; and not knowing his name, I cannot inform the hon. Member what it was. With regard to the other Question, the general rule is, that when applications are made by parties for police, if the application is complied with by the Commissioner, it is always on the condition of the expenses being paid by the parties making the application. The police are frequently allowed to receive gratuities in excess of their expenses. In this case the whole of the expenses were paid by the Russian Government, and I have no doubt that a gratuity was also paid by the Russian Government to the two officers. The Russian Government, however, did not benefit by anything paid out of the police rates of this country.

MR. HENNESSY: The officers got their pay when they were away, of course!

SIR GEORGE GREY: I cannot say, but I rather think not.

THE NEW HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT—THE FRESCOES.—QUESTION.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the Commission appointed to investigate the causes of the decay of the Frescoes in the Houses of Parliament have made a Report; and whether, if so, it will be presented before the close of the Session?

MR. COWPER, in reply, said, the Fine Arts Commission were last year induced to inquire into the decay and unaccountable deterioration in the Frescoes in the Houses of Parliament, and more particularly those in the upper waiting hall. The Fine Arts Commission committed the inquiry to eminent connoisseurs, who united a practical acquaintance with fresco painting with a general knowledge of art. On this Committee were Sir Coutts Lindsay, Mr. Ruskin, Mr. L'Estrange, and Mr. Gambier Parry; and as chemical causes might have occasioned the decay, Mr. Hoffman was associated with them. Those gentlemen examined very minutely and elaborately into the state of the wall paintings in the building, and questioned the artists who painted them. Many causes for the decay were suggested to them—such as the influence of the gas on the paintings, the adulteration of the pigments, and the possibility of the artist having painted on the lime after it was dryer than it ought to have been. But the Committee were unable to arrive at any satisfactory conclusion. The Commission had brought their labours to an end, and had made their final Report, which would shortly be submitted to the House, and therefore they would not be able to assist further in the solution of the difficult problem. He might say, however, that the money voted for fresco paintings would not, in future, be spent upon the same method of painting as that in which the decay had hitherto unhappily occurred. It would be employed in painting according to the water glass method, which was more impervious to atmospheric influences.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

MARRIAGE LAW (IRELAND).

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. DAWSON said, he rose to bring before the notice of the Chief Secretary for Ireland the present position of the General Marriage Law of Ireland, and to suggest that, under the authority of the Government, a revision of such Law shall be undertaken. He believed that the efforts of private Members to deal with this question would not be attended with any satisfactory result, inasmuch as these propositions were entirely incomplete and insufficient, and nothing but the adoption of a bold and direct system would satisfy the public expectation. He trusted that the Government would undertake revision of the marriage law in all its forms, and would introduce into Ireland a system of registration which would involve a change in the law. There were five distinct laws of marriage celebration in force in Ireland, and most vexatious restrictions were imposed. In the north of Ireland, and he believed in all parts of Ireland generally, the Act of 1844 was regarded with disfavour, and its repeal, or its very extensive modification, would give wide-spread satisfaction. Its forms were cumbrous, partial, and unjust. He was strongly of opinion that there should be for Ireland one simple general law of marriage which, repealing all disabilities, should confer equal privileges upon all religions, should carry with it equal rights and responsibilities, and should embrace a system of marriage registration under which the interests of the whole community might be advantageously placed. The present marriage law imposed vexatious restrictions upon the clergy of all denominations. The clergy of the Established Church, who by their learning and religious activity had gained a high position in Ireland, were not allowed full discretion. A Presbyterian minister was privileged to officiate in a mixed marriage where a member of his own congregation was concerned, but only after the proclamation by banns and the production of a licence. Roman Catholic clergymen could not officiate in mixed marriages, and experience daily proved that that exclusion was both unjust and ungenerous. He could not believe that the clergy of the Roman Catholic Church would object to the adoption of a uniform marriage law. Another class of marriages were those at which the attendance of the Registrar was enforced—namely, those of the Nonconformists, who were the chief sufferers under the present Act. He asked on what principle of reason or justice were Wesleyan, Baptist, or Independent ministers precluded from the right to celebrate marriages in the same manner as the Episcopalians or the Catholics? In his opinion there were many forcible reasons why there should be a complete uniformity in the marriage law throughout England, Ireland, and Scotland, and why the highest legal officer of the Crown should direct his attention to the subject. If, however, the amendment of the marriage law were confined to Ireland, he asked that all religious denominations should possess the power of celebrating marriages according to their forms, conscientiously prepared, and that there should be a system of lay agency, similar to that so successfully established in Scotland in 1854. In a season of prosperity there was an increase, and in seasons of adversity a diminution in the number of marriages. This was completely illustrated in the records of marriages in Lancashire during the last two or three years. Marriage statistics, it was admitted, formed an admirable social barometer, and it was one that he should be glad to see applied to Ireland. He appealed to Her Majesty's Government to direct their attention to the subject, with the view of removing an unjust and intolerable grievance.

CEYLON.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. LYALL said, he wished to call attention to the Military Expenditure for Ceylon; and to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, what steps have been taken in order to reduce the annual Charge of £100,000 on the Imperial Exchequer for the Troops in that Island. In bringing this question under the consideration of the House and the Government, he would recall to their recollection what occurred last year. He then adverted to the military expenditure of Ceylon, and connected it with a recommendation to annex that Island (so Indian in its character) to India; and the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies, in his reply, opposed that suggestion, but, at the same time, admitted that he thought the expenditure was capable of reduction. Now, as he saw no alteration in the Army Estimates he was induced to ask the Question that he had put on the paper. The House had never, he believed, laid down any regular principle on which it would defray the expenses of our military forces in the Colonies, though he should judge from past, and indeed, from very recent debates, that when a dependency was rich, flourishing, and with an overflowing exchequer, without hostile tribes within its frontiers, and no fear of foreign aggression, there would be a general expectation that it should discharge all its own civil and military police expenditure. India had never cost this country one shilling from the day of its conquest, but, on the contrary, had been a source of great wealth to England. Java sent an annual tribute of £3,000,000 of produce to Holland after paying all its expenses; but Ceylon, richer than India, and nearly as prosperous as Java, costs this country £110,000 per annum; and if we deducted £10,000 for Imperial naval charges at Trincomalee, a clear £100,000 was paid by this country for its Colonial Government. Now, this charge, so unjust to the British taxpayer, might not have been so when this arrangement was originally made. It was fixed many years ago, when the circumstances of the island were totally different. Ceylon had then a debt, a deficient revenue, and the pacification of the hill tribes of the Candian district was not complete. Now, however, the revenue of the island, which as late as 1854 was only £408,000, had since risen gradually at the rate of £50,000 per annum, and by the last accounts exceeded £757,000. Ceylon had no debt, and good roads had been made through the mountains of Candy, and that district was as peaceful as any portion of the island. The circumstances, therefore, were entirely changed, a much smaller military force would now be required, and whatever was necessary for a military police establishment ought, in such a prosperous colony, to be defrayed out of its own exchequer. Any one who considered the geographical position of Ceylon could have no fear of foreign invasion, as Ceylon possessed an iron-bound coast, and was within two or three days of Madras, where it could procure any amount of troops. There was also an Imperial naval station at Trincomalee, so that in no part of the world was the military and naval supremacy of England more complete.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that in answer to the hon. Gentleman he had little to add to what he stated the other night in a discussion on the Army Estimates. The proposal made last year to annex Ceylon to India had caused no little apprehension in the colony, and an address had lately been received from the Legislative Council entreating Her Majesty not to consent to any such annexation, on the ground that the island was well governed and possessed institutions which were satisfactory to the people. In the opinion of Her Majesty's Government the inhabitants of Ceylon were right in wishing to remain as they are. Her Majesty's Government had, however, taken occasion to represent to the colonists, that if they so highly valued their direct connection with the mother country, they ought to be prepared to make some greater pecuniary sacrifices for the sake of their connection with the mother country, especially as there could be no doubt that the troops in Ceylon were maintained there mainly for purposes of internal order. The total expense of those troops was £200,000, and out of that sum Ceylon contributed more than one-half—namely, £105,000. The whole subject of the Ceylon finance and military establishments had lately undergone a careful examination by a very able member of the Colonial Office. Through the liberality of Parliament, Ceylon had been enabled to develop its prosperity, and the time had now come when it might make a considerably increased contribution towards its military expenditure. There would be no delay on the part of the Home Government in communicating these views to the colonial authorities.

THE GALWAY CONTRACT.

RESOLUTIONS.

MR. BAXTER said, that he rose to move the two Resolutions of which he had given notice on this subject—

"1. That, in the opinion of this House, in cases where ordinary traffic supports several lines of Steamers, the present system of granting Subsidies for carrying the Trans-oceanic Mails ought to be dispensed with."

"2. That this House is not prepared to grant a sum of Money to the Atlantic Royal Mail Company for conveying the Mails between Galway and North America."

The hon. Gentleman said, he thought that the time had arrived when it became the duty of the House to take a stand against the extravagance of successive Governments in granting large sums to Steam Packet Companies for the carrying of mails. Being a merchant himself, and keeping up a correspondence with all Foreign countries, he had a deep interest in seeing that the communication with Foreign ports should be as speedy and as regular as possible, and his sympathies might naturally be expected to be on the side of Government subsidies. But as a representative of the public it was his duty to see that those large grants of money were well bestowed, and that value was received for them. It would not be difficult to show that subsidies, in the cases referred to in his first Resolution, injured both the commerce of this country and the public in general. On this subject he was no theorist, and he was not opposed to subsidies under all circumstances. On the contrary, he freely admitted that most of our great Ocean Companies could not have been established, and some of them even now could not be carried on without help from the national exchequer; his position was simply this, that they had carried this assistance too far, and that the system might be dispensed with on oceans where there was effective competition. The subsidy had been permitted to increase, whereas it might have been gradually reduced, not only without detriment or injury, but with positive advantage to the trade of this country. He found that in 1856-7 the Packet Service Vote amounted to £743,000, and in 1859-60 it had risen to £977,000, being an increase of £234,000. In the following year it had exceeded one million sterling. In 1860 Mr. Frederick Hill told the Packet Service Committee that £450,000, of that sum of one million sterling, was a dead loss to the revenue of the country, and that £79,000 of that loss arose from the Cunard service alone. There was not a Member in that House who must not acknowledge the admirable manner in which the Cunard service had been conducted, and he was free to acknowledge at once that in times past that company deserved all they obtained. But what he wished to call the attention of the House of Commons and Her Majesty's Government to was the state of things on the North Atlantic Ocean, which had been entirely changed, and that they might now, with advantage to the trade of the country, dispense with those subsidies altogether. In 1861 there were no fewer than fifty large steamers employed on the North Atlantic Ocean, making 226 outward voyages, and the same number of homeward voyages, in the course of the year. One company, the Liverpool, New York, and Philadelphia Company, which was totally unaided by Government, at present possessed a fleet of large ocean steamers, comprising 22,000 tons, being an increase of 7,000 tons since the manager of that company gave evidence before the Packet Service Committee in 1860. In 1862 that one company carried 29,000 passengers across the Atlantic, being one-third of the whole number conveyed by steam across that ocean; and he found this very remarkable circumstance, that their passages had been as regular and as speedy as the passages of the Cunard line. In 1861 the average passages made by the ships of this unsubsidized company were shorter than those made by the vessels of the subsidized Cunard Company. In 1862 they were longer, but during the last three months—namely, December, January, and February—the unsubsidized boats had anticipated the arrival of the Cunard boats at New York by an average of five hours. By three successive mails he had received his letters from the United States by the unsubsidized vessel that left on Saturday, only one day after the subsidized vessel that left on the previous Wednesday; and on a fourth occasion he received his letters by the vessel which left on Saturday on the same day as that on which the mail arrived which left on the Wednesday previously. There were also at Southampton two lines of steamers performing their voyages as regularly, and very nearly as speedily, as the subsidized steamers. Sir Samuel Cunard's firm had repeatedly told the Government that unless they obtained a large subsidy they could not afford to build a sufficient number of new vessels to carry on the service. But what was the fact? He found, that while the Cunard Company had put four new vessels on the station within the last seven years, the three unsubsidized companies had put respectively, eight, seven, and five vessels on the station; so much, therefore, for that reason for a large subsidy. They had, on the North Atlantic Ocean, to which his first Resolution applied, precisely that state of things which the Committee (appointed by the Treasury in 1853, and presided over by Lord Canning) recommended should be abolished. That Committee reported in effect that in cases where passengers and commerce were available and an effective competition existed, that it was not necessary for the Government to subsidize the packets for the conveyance of the mails. In 1860 the Chancellor of the Exchequer appointed a Committee to investigate the subject, and it stated—

"Your Committee cannot conclude their Report without recording their conviction that it is quite practicable to dispense with large subsidies in cases where ordinary traffic supports several lines of steamers, and that in the circumstances which have for some years existed with regard to the communication between this Country and North America no such subsidies are required to secure a regular, a speedy, and efficient postal service."

Mr. Baxter

Notwithstanding those recommendations, and in the face of the competition which he had shown to exist, what was being done? The Government continued to pay £170,000 a year to the Cunard Company, and they proposed to pay £78,000 a year to a new Company. Now, he believed that arrangements might be made for carrying the mails across the North Atlantic Ocean without giving another subsidy, the effect of which would be to perpetuate that system of subsidizing which ought to have been got rid of long ago; and he maintained, that so far from being an advantage, it was a barrier in the way of obtaining a more constant and more speedy communication with America. If the House would adopt his Resolution, they would strengthen the hands of the Government in getting rid, at the proper time, of a system which prevented the development of private enterprise by giving an undue advantage to one of two competing Companies. Instead of the Government thus paying a large sum of money, let them advertise that every steamer of a certain tonnage, which passed the Admiralty examination, which sailed from and arrived at an Irish port by a certain day, should be a mail steamer, and be paid at the lowest rate that any company would offer to convey them for according to the number of letters conveyed, and he was satisfied that in three or four months, or say six months, they would have obtained a communication between Ireland and North America, and would find the Companies rivalling each other in producing the best vessels. There was no reason why the well-known maxim of "A fair field and no favour" should not apply in this as in other cases. If the House would pass his first Resolution, it would strengthen the hands of any Government disposed to economize expenditure, and interpose a barrier in the way of any Government who might be careless or reckless of the public resources. In a financial point of view his second Resolution would be of secondary importance, although there were circumstances connected with the matter which might render it the more interesting of the two to the House of Commons. It would be impossible, on the present occasion, to arrive at the merits of the case without glancing, at all events, at the history of what he would designate as nothing else than a bubble company and a political job. He was opposed to this Galway contract on the broad and general ground he had already stated, that there was no occasion on the North Atlantic Ocean for any subsidy at all, and that every shilling spent in that direction was money thrown away. But he opposed it also on account of the origin of the grant, and of the position of the Company now demanding it. He would be sorry to say a word to hurt the feelings of any gentleman, or which might be considered uncalled for; at the same time, it would be quite impossible, and it would also be improper and unjust to the cause he advocated, were he to withhold, from mere motives of delicacy, any portion of the facts necessary to establish his case. Any Gentleman who read the evidence given before the Packet Service Committee of 1860 would find that it was not denied that this contract was originally granted by Lord Derby's Government at a time when it was important for them to strengthen their somewhat precarious position, and render themselves popular in Ireland. Did they know that Lord Colchester, who was Postmaster General in Lord Derby's Government, was opposed to the grant? Did they know that Mr. Stevenson, of the Treasury, strongly objected to it? Did they know that the hon. Member for Stamford (Sir Stafford Northcote), who was then Secretary to the Treasury, and was naturally disposed to look favourably upon the question, but whose judgment it might have been inconvenient to put forward, had little or nothing to do with it? Let any man read the straightforward evidence of the late Lord Eglinton and Lord Derby, and he would see that the grant was made in total ignorance of the state of things existing with regard to Galway; ignorance of the active competition that was going on; ignorance of this, that the interest of Ireland would have been much more effectually provided for than it could have been by this Company, and that without raising and encouraging a delusion, and the throwing away of the public money. There was no Gentleman who had served on that Committee who would not do him the justice to remember that from the beginning he was just as much opposed to the renewal of the Cunard contract as he was in giving it to the Galway Company; and he contended that it was the duty of the Government to insist that Ireland should be the point of arrival and departure, that the American mails should be landed on the first point of British soil; but it was as improper as unnecessary to limit the choice of the port to Galway, and to a particular company sailing from that port. He had been told that Galway was 100 miles nearer America than Valentia. But it was only forty miles nearer; and if we extended the telegraphic communication to Crookhaven, we should get a nearer point than Galway itself. Besides all this, he had heard it stated that it was difficult and dangerous for vessels to make for the port at certain seasons. The Irish Times of the 24th of March, 1862, concluded an able article on this subject with two sentences, which he asked the permission of the House to read—

"On the other hand, little has been done to render Galway what it should be in order to become the great centre of traffic between Ireland and America. The Board of Trade has refused the sum required for the establishment of piers and docks, and there is no hope that the money can be procured from any source."

So that there appeared to be not only a difficulty to get into the harbour, but a further difficulty when in. The merchants of Belfast were in much alarm at some recent rumours lest the American ships should merely call at Galway; and he found that they had memorialized the Treasury in March last, stating that the people of Belfast were indignant at the proposed change, and would have no other place than Galway. And why? Because the merchants of Belfast found that the subsidy enabled them to ship their goods at £2 per ton when they would have to pay £3 elsewhere. Would any Gentleman say that this subsidy was to be kept up in order to increase the profits of the merchants of Belfast? The subsidy was given for carrying the mails; and he never yet heard any one contend that the nation ought to make a grant of money to enable the merchants of Belfast to ship their goods upon cheaper terms. But the merchants of Belfast were beginning to find out the trick which had been played upon them, and he was sure the House would be amused at one of the sentences of that memorial to the Treasury—

"The subsidy would, if means were not taken to prevent it, be made a private job to benefit a few individuals, and not for the great commercial benefit of Ireland."

It was remarkable that these gentlemen should have been so long in finding out that this was a private job; for it was a job at the beginning, it had been a job all along, and it was a job still. And as to the commercial benefit of Ireland, the thing was positively ridiculous. He had heard the merchants of England make merry at the speeches of the noblemen and gentlemen who assembled in Dublin on the subject of this grant to Galway; and to judge from the tone of their speeches, one would suppose that the subsidy was to make Ireland "great, glorious, and free." And why did the English merchants make merry? Because they knew that neither £78,000 a year, nor double £78,000 a year, would make the undertaking pay. He maintained they could not; and if they could, they had no right, out of the public money, unnaturally to stimulate the trade of any particular port. The Postmaster General had stated, that every letter sent by the Galway Company cost this country 6s. He therefore put an end to the contract. This raised a clamour in Ireland; and then the present Government yielded, and renewed the contract. He would endeavour to establish two points—First, that the yielding on the part of the Government had been owing to inaccurate and improper representations; and secondly, that Her Majesty's Government had not shown proper wisdom and precaution in the matter. He had taken the trouble to look over the papers. The Chairman of the Packet Committee of 1860, the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Angerstein), writing of them, said—

"The Galway packet papers make a most melancholy exhibition; and it is difficult to say whether that of the Government or that of the Company is the most pitiful."

The Chairman went on to say that even worse still was the spectacle of the poor Irish contributors for ordinary shares, who had been swamped, and who were seeking to get their subsidy through the weakness of Her Majesty's Government. The other day he received a letter from a poor man in Ireland (who had been induced to invest £80 of the hard earnings of some years in this undertaking, and who naturally expected that he might get some of it back again) remonstrating with him on his cruelty in opposing a renewal of the subsidy. He felt the deepest sympathy for this poor man and the many hundred other persons in Ireland who had likewise been induced to throw away their money; but he maintained that it was the part of true friendship not to hold out false hopes, but to tell them frankly that the money was finally and irrecoverably gone. Lord Clanciarde the other day, at a meeting of this Company, used these words, "Undoubtedly, the original shareholders appeared to be in a very disadvantageous position."

Mr. Baxter

That was a very mild expression—"disadvantageous"—a word, he supposed, suited to the atmosphere of another place. But what was their position? What was their disadvantageous position? In order to answer this question let them go to the balance-sheet of the Atlantic Mail Company. There he found the following items:—

"To deposit and calls paid upon the original shares, £377,371 8s. 9d.; less amount written off in conformity with the resolutions of general meetings, for expenditure and losses up to the 31st of December, 1861, £388,109 14s. 6d."

So that at that date, £11,000 more than the original capital was all lost. Alderman Reynolds, of Dublin, who was once a Member of this House, used this expression at the same meeting—

"Somebody said to me in Dublin the other day, 'Alderman Reynolds, you ought not to consent to this issue of £600,000 preference stock, because, if you do, the original shareholders will not get anything.' 'Why,' I replied, 'the present capital is gone, and it is the only chance we have of getting anything.' This seemed to take him by surprise; but he made no other objection to raising the preference stock. The whole of our money has gone by mismanagement, and I would tread lightly on the ashes of the dead."

He would also tread lightly on the ashes of the dead; but there were some things which would not die. Seeing, then, that this Phoenix Company was still in existence, it became his duty to show its present position to the House. They had raised £400,000 by means of preferential shares; and according to the correspondence on the table, page 12, those shares were to have priority, in all respects, over the original capital, to be entitled to 7 per cent dividend, and participate with the original shares in any dividend there might be after the payment of that 7 per cent. Was there any man in existence so foolish as to imagine there was the slightest chance of the original shareholders getting back a single farthing? At this point he would, with deep regret, part with the 1,877 shareholders, many of whom were poor people, and all of them, he believed, anxious to advance the interests of their country. Then came the preference shareholders, of whom there were only 23. Of these 23 preference shareholders how many did the House suppose lived in Ireland? Only one. He recollected him well, for he gave his evidence before the Packet Committee in the most patriotic manner. That gentleman was Mr. Denis Kirwan, of Castle Hackett, in the county of Galway, who was a subscriber for 500 preferential shares out of the £400,000. And who were the others? They were all friends, retainers, and adherents of a well-known banking firm in Lombard Street. The only effect of the policy of Her Majesty's Government, if ratified by the House, would be to enable those persons to sell their preferential shares without incurring a total loss. Well, then, what possible good could such a Company do for Ireland? Apart from the shareholders, neither financially nor in point of ships had this Company ability to carry on the trade. In the admirable Report drawn up by Mr. Seudamore, of the Admiralty, and Mr. Stevenson, of the Treasury, there appeared these words—

"It does not appear, from the accounts and information rendered by this Company, that it possesses any funds from which those claims, amounting to upwards of £160,000, can be met. From the foregoing extract it appears that the real commercial value of the Company's fleet, upon the security of which the sum of £246,000 has been borrowed, is considered by the Admiralty to be £407,000, instead of £808,000, the value set upon it by the Company."

Then, as to the ships. The Hibernia and the Columbia were two years ago condemned as being somewhat unseaworthy. He was perfectly aware that they had since been strengthened in the yard of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Laird); but he was prepared to state to the House, after a careful consideration of these papers and many communications from gentlemen who were thoroughly acquainted with these steam ships, that these patched-up vessels and the Adriatic were utterly unable to render the service required of them in the manner in which the late Government wished it. For although he blamed the late Government for entering into this contract, the contract was strictly worded that the vessels should go from Galway to St. John's in six days. The two gentlemen appointed by the Government had declared that six vessels were necessary to carry out the contract. At present the Company had only one vessel capable of fulfilling the conditions of the contract. [Mr. BAOWELL: What is the date of that?] This was the Report of October last, of Mr. Seudamore and Mr. Stevenson. In August, 1862, the Controller of the Navy, after inspecting the Hibernia at Liverpool, sent in a report in which he said he considered it doubtful whether that vessel would be able to do more than keep her time with favourable weather, especially when she had on board her ballast and sea stores. A friend of his, having noticed a statement respecting the speed of the Hibernia with 800 tons of coal on board, wrote to him saying that the Connaught burnt 120 tons a day, and that, at that rate of consumption, the Hibernia ought to carry 1,300 tons of coal on starting for her winter voyage; for steamers half the size and half the horsepower, sailing from Liverpool, carried 1,000 tons. The Government seemed to have been hoping against hope that something would turn up to justify them in acceding to the wishes of certain parties in Ireland, and on receiving the letter of the Company, of the 26th of January last, they promised the restoration of the subsidy. The Company stated that their fleet was wholly unincumbered, and not subject to any liability which could in any manner affect the service, for which they had ample working capital. He was much surprised by that statement, but equally surprised by the Government replying, that they regarded the letter of the Company as conveying compliance with the demands of the Government with respect to the independent possession of the ships of the Company. He was not so satisfied as the Government, and he obtained copies of the registers of the ships, which showed, that although on the 17th of February the Hibernia and the Adriatic were free, there were still mortgages on the registers of the other two vessels, dated March 1861. He had said it was quite impossible that a subsidy of £78,000 could make the Company pay if their vessels sailed from Galway; and they had found that out themselves. Mr. Inman, the agent of one of the Liverpool Companies, said he had reason to know that a desire existed not to confine the Galway steamers to the port of Galway, which restriction was made the ground of application for the subsidy, but to obtain power to make Liverpool or some other English port in reality the port of departure, in which case the subsidy would be equal to £3,000 a voyage to enable a new company, consisting of a small number of preference shareholders, to undersell and take from the Philadelphia Company a trade hardly earned by thirteen years of anxious toil without any Government assistance whatever. This was the statement of Mr. Inman; but he had read in seven newspapers the following announcement:—

"It is intended that the subsidized Galway packets shall start from Southampton in order to secure a portion of the vast and lucrative continental traffic with America. The steamers will depart from Southampton in time to leave Galway at the contract time."

So the vessels were to start from Southampton and make a pleasant voyage round Ireland, and were to go by way of Newfoundland to New York. Not only had the Government agreed to renew the subsidy, but they had voluntarily intimated their willingness to modify the terms of the contract made by the late Government, and to reconsider the ports of arrival and departure. All this, they were told, was owing to a vague declaration made eighteen months ago by the noble Lord at the head of the Government, which declaration was founded on a sentence of the Report of the Committee of 1861, presided over by the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory). That sentence was—

"Your Committee are of opinion, that should it be deemed advisable to re-establish postal communication between the west coast of Ireland and America, the Atlantic Steam-packet Company are deserving of the favourable consideration of Her Majesty's Government."

This was no promise for the restoration; and if it were, was the Atlantic Company, because backed by a few Irish representatives, the only Company with which the Government and the House of Commons were bound to keep faith? Had the House forgotten that four years ago the Treasury pledged itself to parties in Liverpool that there should be no further contract for the conveyance of mails to America that should not be open to public competition, and that on the 30th of May, 1861, the noble Lord made exactly the same statement? What could be the reason that the Government, in the face of the Report of Messrs. Scudamore and Stevenson, had renewed the contract? Did any man doubt that it was to secure the support of the Irish Members? Some weeks ago the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) said, that the great Liberal party had been making political capital out of the Galway contract for three years, and now the present Government had done the very same thing that was done by their predecessors, and had done it for the same reason. That statement was quite true; and if it were wrong of the late Government, on insufficient inquiry, to give to an unknown Company a contract for an ocean mail service which was not required, was it not more wrong of the present Government, after all the concerns of the Company had been elucidated, to continue a delusion and to confirm a job? He had heard a rumour that some kind of a compact had been entered into between the Government and certain of the representatives of Ireland, the price of whose support being the renewal of this contract; and whilst he disbelieved the rumour, he must say that the conduct of the Government in renewing the subsidy with the information they possessed gave colour to a rumour of that kind. He was utterly at a loss to understand why the Treasury Minute had been issued, if it had not been to provide for the political exigencies of the moment; the words uttered by Lord John Russell, on the 30th of May, 1861, were still ringing in his ears—

Mr. Baxter

"And, Sir, with respect to the matter of the Galway Contract, I say that rather than the Government should make any concession on that question in order to obtain votes, it would be better ten Ministries should be defeated, and that the House of Commons should be ten times dissolved, than that such a stain should be cast upon the Government of this country. And when I say that it is better ten Ministries should be defeated, and the House of Commons ten times dissolved, that is a consequence that would not be avoided; on the contrary, it is a consequence that would be brought on if any Government in this country were to act in so profligate a manner; because it is not to be supposed that this is a question in which one part only of the United Kingdom is interested. Galway Contracts might spring up in other parts of the kingdom; and if any ten or twenty Gentlemen, in the divided state of the House, or of the great parties which are represented here, found that they had defeated one Ministry by this means, the new Ministry would soon experience a similar attempt to make them stoop to this degradation."

These were noble and stirring words; but they had soon been forgotten, and he called upon the independent Members of that House to impress them on the front benches of both sides of the House. Though £78,000 might be a "paltry and contemptible" sum, yet it would be improper and unconstitutional in a Government to give it for political reasons at the instance of a certain number of Members, and it might pave the way for practices which might be common in the lobbies of the Capitol at Washington, but which would not be tolerated in the British House of Commons. He was informed, that according to the rules of the House, he could not divide on both Resolutions. He had considered the first the more important of the two, but it was not so immediately pressing as the second; and therefore he moved, as an Amendment to the Motion, that Mr. Speaker leave the Chair, the second Resolution that stood in his name. He entreated the House to take a course which, however small and paltry the sum involved might appear to be, would teach a lesson and establish a principle which would not be forgotten by the Cabinets of England in time to come.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House is not prepared to grant a sum of Money to the Atlantic Royal Mail Company for conveying the Mails between Galway and North America,"

—instead thereof.

MR. HORSFALL begged to second the Amendment of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter). He said the House was much indebted to that hon. Gentleman for his able and impartial statement of the case. He was sure the country would be greatly astonished at the course taken by Her Majesty's Government in granting the Galway Contract after the strenuous manner in which the Members of the present Administration had opposed a similar contract when made by the late Government. His attention was first called to the Galway Contract by a letter from Mr. Inman, acting partner of the Liverpool, New York, and Philadelphia Steam Ship Company, who brought it under his notice on the ground so strongly urged by his hon. Friend in the conclusion of his speech—namely, the ground of breach of faith. In the Report of the Committee of 1860 would be found references to interviews had by different gentlemen representing Steam Packet Companies with Departments of the Government. It is stated that Mr. Inman offered to convey the mails for the amount of the ocean postage. On the 15th of October, 1858, Mr. Inman wrote to the Secretary of the Treasury remonstrating against any mail grant to the Lever Company without competition. He said—

"If any mail grant is to be given between Galway and any other port, I beg to submit it ought to be put up to public competition."

In reply to that, and a further communication, Mr. Inman received from the Secretary to the Treasury a letter to the following effect:—

"I am desired by the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to inform you, in reply to the letter addressed by you to the Board, on behalf of the Liverpool New York, and Philadelphia Steam Ship Company, that when a new postal service is about to be established by the Government it is the practice of their Lordships to invite tenders by public advertisements, thereby affording to all parties the opportunity of competing for such services, provided they conform to the required conditions."

Very shortly after that letter was addressed to Mr. Inman, the Government of the day, without any further communication with him, entered into a contract with the Galway Steam Packet Company. From the fact that the Montreal Ocean Steam Ship Company offered to take the contract of the Galway Company, and give the latter a bonus of £25,000 a year to relinquish their contract, it must be obvious to every one that the Government must have made a very liberal contract with the Galway directors. He would now refer to a letter which Mr. Inman addressed to the Postmaster General on the 9th of February last, in which he said—

"On reference to the original contract it will be seen that the time fixed for the conveyance of the mails between Galway and Boston and New York by the Galway boats offers no advantage of speed over our own between Cork harbour and New York; while several years ago we offered to convey regularly the British mails for the ocean postage, and the records in your Lordships' Department will show that we have never failed to despatch a steamer every week from Ireland without any subsidy whatever, and, when required, two steamers in the week."

The House had been told that the chief argument in favour of the contract was that it was one made to an Irish company. He thought it had already been shown that for all practical purposes there was only one Irishman connected with the Company, and only one holder of the 7 per cent preference shares. In the Report presented to the House on the 22nd of May, 1860, the Committee stated that Lord Derby's decision sanctioning the contract with the Galway Company had been given in ignorance of several of the circumstances bearing strongly on the case, including the implied pledge to Mr. Inman that any new service would be thrown open to competition. But the present Government could not have been ignorant of that pledge, and therefore their conduct in the matter was far worse than that of the Government of Lord Derby. However, the question was not one between the late Government and the present. It was the duty of the House to decide whether the contract should be made, and that issue was submitted to them in a practical form by the Resolution of his hon. Friend, which he now begged leave to second.

Mr. GREGORY said, that he could not find fault with the fairness of his hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) in treating this subject, but he would make an appeal to his hon. Friend. He would ask him, after the decision to be arrived at that evening, to leave this Galway Company in peace. The reason he made this appeal was that there was very great distress in Ireland at the present moment. Really the existing poverty in that part of the world was shocking, and to alleviate it in some degree it was intended to make very extensive improvements in the harbour of Galway; but so long as there was uncertainty as to the action of Parliament it was impossible to obtain the necessary funds for those improvements. He therefore trusted the decision of that evening would be considered as final. As to the Resolution of his hon. Friend, he objected to it in form and substance. It was skilfully drawn for bringing into the lobby with the hon. Member two different classes of opinions. Some Gentlemen were anxious for the reduction of all subsidies; others, though generally in favour of subsidies, had a strong objection to the Galway Contract; and the hon. Gentleman's Resolutions were framed to catch the support of both these classes. He objected altogether to the hon. Gentleman's first Resolution; for though he was as anxious as any man to see reductions made wherever they were possible, yet the greatest care ought to be exercised lest the efficiency of the Postal Service should be impaired. In the Postal Service regularity of despatch and speed of transmission were of vital importance, and these could not be obtained except from subsidized companies. A paper had recently been put into his hands, which showed the average rate of speed of subsidized and non-subsidized lines. This showed that the average passage of Inman's line, which was not subsidized, was 16 days 20 hours in winter, and 13 days 16 hours in summer; whereas the passage of the Cunard line, which was a subsidized line, was 12 days 10 hours in winter, and 10 days 6 hours in summer. At the rate of speed required from the Galway line the passage would be 10 days 13 hours in summer, and 11 days 17 hours in winter. A high rate of speed, too, greatly increased the expense. The increase from nine to ten knots an hour made it necessary for the West India Company to increase their expenditure from £264,802 in 1851 to £403,769 in 1853. The speed required from the Galway Company was over eleven knots, and it had been calculated by Mr. Atherton, chief engineer at Woolwich, that the freight of goods carried at ten miles an hour ought to be double the freight of those carried at eight miles. A purely commercial company, therefore, must either increase its freight to almost double the amount on its goods if it is to keep up the present rate of speed of postal companies, or the public must be content with a great loss of time in delivery of the mails. Lord Canning's Committee had laid the strongest stress on the punctuality and rapidity of the transmission of letters attained by these subsidized companies. They said—

"Not only is this service simply rapid—it is also regular, and the mercantile community can reckon, with the utmost certainty, on the punctual despatch and arrival of mails."

This regularity and punctuality it was impossible to obtain unless the Government had that stringent power of enforcing rules and regulations which the grant of a subsidy gave them. By the aid of these subsidies the great Steam Navigation Companies had been able to create magnificent fleets of splendid vessels, which in time of war were an important element in the strength of England. In the Crimean war the Government took up from three companies 29 vessels, of an aggregate tonnage of 53,000 tons and 12,700 horse power; and two of these companies, the Peninsular and Oriental and the West India Mail, still continued to keep up their communications with uninterrupted regularity. These companies never could have kept up these great fleets without subsidies, for it was well known that the working expenses exceeded the net earnings of the lines. The Emperor of the French had subsidized lines to Brazil and the Southern Seas, for the expressed and declared object of increasing commercial traffic, and of creating additional elements of maritime strength; and the Americans, as might be seen in almost every American paper, had never ceased to regret that they had not kept up their great Collins line. He could not, therefore, agree with the hon. Gentleman's reasoning as to subsidized lines. Turning, however, to a subject much more important to himself and the Irish Members generally—the Galway Contract—he was not in the least affected by the opinions of Mr. Dunlop (which the hon. Gentleman had read to the House), nor was he prepared to allow the truth of the accusation so strongly made by the hon. Gentleman that this Galway Contract was entered into by Lord Derby's Government for political purposes. It had been shown over and over again in that House, that that assertion was utterly untenable. It had been proved over and over again, by dates, and by reference to various communications, that the late Government had determined to grant the subsidy, on the recommendation of Lord Eglinton, long before there was a question of a dissolution. The hon. Gentleman said it was done to gain popularity. Popularity certainly did follow on the act. The people of Ireland were grateful to the late Government for the course they adopted, and the hon. Gentleman said Post hoc, ergo propter hoc—because popularity followed, therefore it was done for popularity. He contended that the Government and the House were bound in honour to confirm the grant. The Committee of which he was Chairman came to a resolution, that if the Government were of opinion that there should be postal communication with a western port of Ireland, the Atlantic Company should be favourably considered. It had been intimated to the House, by the noble Lord at the head of the Government, in July, 1861, that the demand made by the Irish Members for postal communication between the west of Ireland and America was a very fair one; the noble Lord on that occasion said he could assure his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory) that Her Majesty's Government were of opinion that the port of Galway presented the greatest natural advantages. Now, he was perfectly satisfied to advance that opinion against all the calumnies which his hon. Friend the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) had that evening lavished upon the port of Galway. He would go further, and tell the House in reference to the capabilities of that port, that during the whole of the exceptionally severe winter, during which the ships were running to and from America, not a single accident happened there, except one, the circumstances connected with which were of a very suspicious character. It was well, also, that hon. Members generally should be informed that the Secretary to the Treasury had written a letter on the 31st of January last, in which he said, that subject to the Admiralty being satisfied as to the efficiency of the vessels themselves, Her Majesty's Government were prepared to enter into an engagement with the Company, and to propose a Vote to Parliament in pursuance thereof. On the faith of those assurances the Company had spent £200,000 in improving their vessels and rendering them fit for the service. Under all the circumstances of the case, therefore, the Government were, he thought, bound to grant them the subsidy for which they asked. But his hon. Friend had found fault with the merchants of Belfast for having petitioned in favour of the Company, alleging that they had done so on the ground that they would get their goods carried by it at a cheaper rate. It should, however, be borne in mind, that they had petitioned in favour of a grant for postal communication between Ireland and America in 1851, long before the ships were ready, while it was also represented that they were anxious for its continuance in order that they might have an opportunity of sending their linens to Galway, and thus prevent their being injured in the transport to Liverpool or some other English port. When, moreover, his hon. Friend said that letters which had been sent by the Galway line cost the country at the rate of 6s., he was conveying a false impression to the House, because, in consequence of the doubts connected with the action of the Government towards the Company, only a small part of the Irish correspondence passed over the Galway line. Of course, therefore, the smallness of the number of letters sent increased the average expense of each letter. That was, however, an exceptional state of things, and no one knew better the fallacy he was employing than his hon. Friend (Mr. Baxter). It was perfectly notorious that one-third of the letters despatched from the British Isles which went to America went from Ireland, so that she was perfectly entitled to ask for some portion of the money expended on postal communication with that country. Another cause of complaint alleged against the Company by his hon. Friend, was that it was carried on by English capital. For his own part, so far from feeling aggrieved at hearing that most of the money of the Company was subscribed by English capitalists, he should be very glad to find them applying their resources to the amelioration of Ireland. His hon. Friend, had, however, proceeded to take great exception to the ships of the Company; but he believed the Surveyor of the Admiralty had nothing to say against them now, while he was given to understand that the trial of one of them—the Columbia—had recently proved to be perfectly satisfactory. He had, indeed, been challenged by his hon. Friend to proceed to America in one of these vessels, but he begged leave to decline the challenge, not from any want of confidence in the ships, but because he was perfectly aware that the Northern States were in that state of moral blindness that they were unable to appreciate their true friends, and he had no desire, for the mere sake of inaugurating the undertaking, to run the risk of undergoing certain processes sometimes inflicted in those States under the influence of popular excitement. But his hon. Friend had quoted the letter of Mr. Inman, to show that there was some underhand dealing on the part of the Company with reference to the place which they intended to select as a port of departure, it being insinuated that they proposed to fix upon Southampton. Now, to that rumour he was in a position to give a most positive contradiction, inasmuch as there was not, he believed, the slightest intention on the part of the Company to transfer—nor had there ever been any communications between them and any other body which could reasonably give rise to the impression that they meant to transfer—their vessels from Galway to Southampton, or any other English port. His hon. Friend had gone beyond that, and had stated that a compact had been entered into between the Irish Members and the Government on the subject. To that statement, also, he could give an equally emphatic and peremptory denial. The Irish Members only asked firmly, but respectfully, for a renewal of the grant, on the ground that large sums were spent in England for various public undertakings—for arms, ships, clothing, dockyards, &c.—and that the Irish people, who were taxed for all those purposes, were entitled to some share in the benefits of the national expenditure. His hon. Friend asked what would be the effect of granting the subsidy. He could, from his own observation, assure him that during the time the vessels were running from Galway to America the greatest improvements were taking place in that port. Everything there, in fact, seemed to be undergoing a change for the better; and he was convinced that if the subsidy were renewed, Galway and the West of Ireland, indeed the whole of Ireland, would derive from it the greatest advantage. There was at present, he might add, much misery and no small amount of discontent prevailing in Ireland, and such was not the moment when the House should refuse the small boon she asked. He sincerely trusted that in the future the Treasury would not raise unnecessary obstacles, but would deal with the Company fairly, honestly, and in a generous spirit, saying, "We have done our best to help you through your difficulties; now go and help yourselves."

Mr. Horsfall

MR. BENTINCK said, that the hon. Gentleman who had introduced the subject had expressed his surprise that there should have been acts of jobbery on the part of two Governments, and his hope that in future there would be no renewal of such practices. He could not share either in the feeling of surprise as to the past, or in the hope as to the future. A study of the political history of the country had convinced him that there never had been a Government which did not job, and he believed there never would be a Government that would not job. He looked upon the Galway subsidy as having been, in the first instance, what is commonly called a job. It was a job in the sense in which every Government has jobbed heretofore, and every Government will job hereafter; it was a wasteful and indiscreet expenditure of public money for the purpose of making political capital. The hon. Member for Galway had indignantly repudiated the idea that it was ever intended to have the effect of influencing the votes of Irish Members. He entirely acquitted the Irish Members of that imputation, but the hon. Gentleman admitted that it was to make the Government popular in Ireland, and he would not go into the distinction between obtaining popularity and obtaining votes, as it appeared to him to be a distinction without a difference. But if the whole affair was a job in the first instance, what was it in the second? The Company undertook at starting that which they had neither capital nor ability to perform; but when their affairs had been looked into, as they were recently, when their inability to carry out the contract was clearly shown, that which was a job in the original grant was a greater job in the renewal. He regretted that the hon. Member (Mr. Baxter) had omitted the first Resolution, as it was of far greater importance than the second. The Galway Contract question was a small matter as compared with the general subject of subsidies, which he hoped the House would at an early period consider. He went further than the hon. Member, for he thought, that in accordance with the principles of free trade, every description of subsidy should be done away with. The House had no right to tax the great mass of the people for the benefit of the mercantile portion of the community. The changes that took place in the rates of postage some years since were, he believed, ill-advised; they benefited a small portion of the public at the expense of the great mass of the people. The poor man who wrote a letter perhaps once a year, derived but a small advantage; while the mercantile community reaped a large benefit. The effect of granting subsidies was exactly similar; and he trusted the day was not far distant when they would be entirely discontinued. Those who had occasion to correspond with America should pay whatever was required to enable the correspondence to be transmitted. He admitted that the question was one which should be dealt with cautiously, and that care should be taken that no injustice was done to those who now held contracts. In the present case, however, no injury could result except to the twenty-seven shareholders who had been spoken of, who were not Irish. He hoped the House would affirm the Resolution, and that they would thereupon enter into a discussion which should lead to the doing away of all subsidies.

MR. WHITESIDE: Sir, the hon. Gentleman who introduced the Motion said that he had bestowed immense attention upon this subject. I can fully appreciate the force of that remark. The Galway Contract seems to have occupied his waking and his sleeping thoughts for a long period of time, and he appears to have staked his political reputation on destroying what he has been pleased to pronounce a gross political job. It is a very long time since this question was first raised in Ireland. A Committee sat upon the subject in the Mansion House, Dublin, in the year 1850; and that the House may understand who were the political jobbers who commenced the movement which ended in the attainment of the Contract, I will read the names of the members of that Committee. They were:— Benjamin Lee Guinness, John D'Arcy, Joshua Pim, David Latouche, Denis Moylan, Francis Codd, Joseph Napier, and another individual whom I will not mention. The question has occupied the attention of the public for a long period, and I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman that it ought to be considered on Imperial grounds. I know my duty to this House too well to press the provincial view, nor can the question be fully argued on narrow principles. But how did the hon. Gentleman prove on Imperial grounds that this contract ought not to be granted? Was it by facts? He has no facts. Geography is against him; the terrestrial globe is the strongest argument in our favour. If we had a Parliament sitting in Dublin, and an opportunity of representing to the Minister upon the spot that there were 2,000,000 of our countrymen in America, that the trade of the North of Ireland was mainly with that part of the world, and that according to the laws of nature and of justice our letters and communications ought not to be carried past our shores, how should we act towards a Minister who declared that those letters should continue to be carried past the coast of Ireland and sent back to us again after a considerable delay? For the benefit of the country we should deal with him as a political idiot, and dispense with him accordingly. What was the opinion given by Sir Rowland Hill before a Commission years ago on this very point?—

"It appears to me, as far as the convenience of the Post Office is concerned, that the port of arrival and despatch of American mails cannot be too far to the West; that the further it is situated in that direction the better; so long at least as it is not beyond the reach of railway communication."

That is a direct authority in favour of the principle for which we contend. It is not an Irish witness seeking to establish Irish views, but a man in high position giving testimony which no one can contradict, for it appeals to the evidence of our senses. He says further—

"I entertain this opinion partly because the progress by railway would be quicker than by steam packet, and partly because a more westerly packet station would enable us to serve the western parts of Ireland better than at present. If the port were situated in the West or South West, it would be possible to bring letters to all parts of England and Scotland probably ten or twelve hours earlier than at present, while as regards Ireland, which receives one-third of the whole correspondence, the time saved would be much greater."

It is quite true that the movement in which the South and West are so interested began in the North of Ireland. The residents in that part of the country are clear-headed gentlemen with a good deal of Scotch blood in their veins, but softened by a residence in Ireland. Sir Rowland Hill was also asked how Belfast would be benefited by the establishment of a packet station in the West or South West as compared with existing arrangements, and as compared also with arrangements for landing the mails at Holyhead. He replied—

"Assuming the packet station to be Galway, and the railway thence to Dublin to be completed, I find, as compared with existing arrangements, that the town of Belfast would, under ordinary circumstances, benefit to the extent of about forty-one hours; and when the arrangements for landing the mails at Holyhead are carried out, the saving will be about twenty hours."

The time of which he is speaking is ten years ago. Since then the merchants of Belfast have subscribed to the formation of a railway, which is now completed, bringing the North and West into immediate communication. Anybody who lives in Scotland will be able to dine in Glasgow, to sail from Greenock the same evening, and to land on the quay of Belfast at four next morning, to proceed thence to Galway without delay, and, if he chooses, to sail out into the Atlantic before midday, thereby avoiding the voyage through the Channel. A few years since I happened to be staying near the coast, within six or seven miles of Belfast, and saw a steamer passing rapidly; and on asking what it meant I was told it was going to take off the passengers belonging to the Africa, one of the Cunard vessels, which had grounded on the Copeland Rocks. If it had not been a perfectly calm night, every soul must have perished; but, as it was, all the passengers were brought in safety to Belfast. It has always been matter of surprise how the Great Britain, under the care of a skilful navigator, could have found her way to the place where she remained so long an object of curiosity; but it was easier to get ashore than to get off again. On a third occasion the America, whilst in the Channel, went ashore. The witness examined regarding the danger of the Channel passage, replied that it would no doubt be a very great advantage to escape it altogether.

Mr Whiteside

Is it surprising that Belfast men should wish to escape it and to get their letters forty hours sooner than they did under the old system? To men of business time is money, and unless you are prepared to say that Ireland is to be governed on principles which would utterly ignore the interests of the Irish community, you cannot justify bringing letters past their shores and sending them back again. The hon. Gentleman says the Irish representatives are unanimous on this point. I admit it, and I cannot see that he has given us any reason why they should not be. He has failed to show that letters will not be obtained quicker, and telegraphs more satisfactorily, by the Galway line than by any other route. Until he does so, I cannot understand how the natural advantages of the line can be impeached. The hon. Gentleman appeared to night, as it seemed to me, in the character of an indignant patriot. He said the question was originally Irish, and therefore the scheme ought to be rejected. Certain English capitalists took it up and embarked money in it; therefore, a maiori fortiori, it ought to be rejected. Nothing remains but to make it Scotch, to concentrate our thoughts and affections on the far north, to carry the undertaking to "Aberdeen awa'," and then its patriotic character will be immediately established. The hon. Gentleman inquired whether one of the ships had not been mortgaged. Suppose Mr. Cunard mortgages one of his vessels, does that affect the contract entered into with him? [Mr. BAXTER: It ought to do so.] That is a point which it is necessary to clear up. If there be a contract under stringent conditions, those conditions must be complied with, or the contract will not be fulfilled. But if the services stipulated for in the contract be performed, how is the question affected by the mortgage of a particular ship?

MR. ROEBUCK: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to say that the charge is utterly untrue.

MR. WHITESIDE: That interpolation entirely changes the nature of the argument, for it shows, that however telling may have been the speech of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), one of the facts on which he mainly relies is no fact at all. The hon. Member also asked how the service could be conducted by this Company. That is a very proper question. But, looking at the correspondence, can any one suppose that the Treasury, the Admiralty, or the Post Office have been particularly lenient with the Galway Company, or that they have not watched it with the closest and strictest scrutiny? The hon. Gentleman says other persons apart from the Company are interested in this contract. Let me ask, if a contractor sells his interest to another, does that in the slightest degree impeach the validity of the contract? Why, I was told that Mr. Cunard once parted with his interest to some extent. I deny the right of the hon. Gentleman, or of the Government, to make that a ground of objection. If he performs his engagements faithfully and efficiently, you have no right to inquire whether he shares the remuneration with other persons. The hon. Gentleman placed two Resolutions on the paper. The first was a just Resolution; the second, in my opinion, an unjust one. With great disinterestedness and generosity he withdrew the Resolution which raised a principle, and pressed that which struck at a contract. It seems to me that the hon. Gentleman put down the first as a cover for the second, and appealed, I am sorry to say, to prejudices unworthy of a statesman against a country which wants nothing but what is right, and will not support the Government one whit more for granting the subsidy than it would have done had it been refused. Such, at least, I can assure the hon. Gentleman is my intention. Now, let us hear what Mr. Laing says—

“There would be no sort of justice in cancelling the contract on the grounds of general policy, unless we are prepared to take the same course with the Cunard and other contracts which stand precisely upon the same footing.”

Now, Mr. Laing is a political economist; he was Secretary to the Treasury, and, I understand, is about to enter the House again as the representative of a great commercial city. He then made this remark—

“That as long as subsidies for steam services across the Atlantic were granted, inasmuch as Ireland contributed about a third of the whole postage, and afforded the nearest point of departure, and therefore the speediest route to America, Ireland might justly claim a right to the contract.”

I think that is good logic. No doubt it is true that many curious things are done by the Government. I was turning over the statute book the other day, and by mere accident I lighted upon the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 48, in which I found that the Commissioners of the Treasury are empowered to accept £50,000 in full satisfaction of £228,374 9s. 8d. due to the Commissioners of the Treasury on security of the harbour and docks of Leith, and secured by bonds payable by the City of Edinburgh. I commend that case to the consideration of the hon. Gentlemen—it was passed at the end of the Session, and I mean to preserve it as a curious illustration of the care bestowed upon their friends in Scotland by hon. Gentlemen from the North who give a steady support to the Ministers of the day. I make no attack on the Treasury for that transaction. I am content to believe that the inhabitants of Leith made out a good case, and that the Ministers were convinced on that occasion. Now, with regard to the passengers carried by the Galway route, I find by a Return which has been presented to the House of Commons, that while by two rival lines there were carried 84 and 163 passengers respectively each voyage, by the Galway line 373 were carried. The cause of that difference in amount was that the Galway line attempted to carry third-class passengers, which the other lines did not, and it is among that class that the greatest loss of life usually occurs. From the Report of Major Robinson it appeared that in 1847 there were 89,000 emigrants from Ireland, of whom 5,893 perished at sea and 10,000 died upon their arrival in America. Now, if you give to the Empire at large its let- ters more quickly by the Galway than by any other route—if you do a great service to Ireland, and at the same time preserve human life, then I say there is a strong case for giving the contract to Ireland. With regard to Liverpool, when the Commissioners inquired respecting its harbour, Mr. Cunard himself stated that at present the departure of the packets depended upon the fluctuating state of the tide, and the mails and passengers were often detained for a length of time varying from six to seven hours. And with respect to Holyhead, Mr. Cunard said he did not see any particular objection to it as a place of call on the passage home, provided a proper pier were erected; but to call at Holyhead in the passage to America would deprive us of the use of the northern passage, which was of very great consequence, and would frequently cause considerable delay. I have said what would be the gain to Glasgow by making Galway a packet station. Glasgow carries on an extensive business with Belfast, they have admirable steamers there; and, as I said before, a man leaving Glasgow in the evening might arrive at Belfast about four o'clock in the morning. It must, then, be a clear advantage to Scotland to have a station at Galway; and therefore the hon. Gentleman is in this instance disinterested, because I believe he is the first Scotchman that ever spoke a word against the interests of Scotland. Can the hon. Gentleman inform me of any instance where a merchant who has entered into a contract has repudiated it without sufficient reasons? This Contract has been made by a Vote of Parliament. Will you not apply to public matters a line of conduct which would be followed in private affairs? But how do you propose to get rid of this contract? By an abstract Resolution. I have a horror of all abstract Resolutions. Whenever I think of them, my mind turns upon Parliamentary Reform. And with all the great questions before us—Poland, Naples, Greece, and all the other matters which occupy the thoughts of our distinguished Administration—why does the hon. Gentleman concentrate his abilities upon this small question? It was not usual in old times to fetter the Executive. The money is not granted; but the new practice is to make the executive Government a mere creature of the House of Commons, and to tell them they shall not be at liberty to propose a Vote which they have not proposed, but which upon good grounds they are likely to propose. The hon. Gentleman has said this contract is a political job. Every Gentleman has a right to his opinion; but having heard the views of a distinguished countryman of the hon. Gentleman, then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (the Earl of Eglinton) upon the subject, I believe a decision was never arrived at upon more conscientious grounds. Believe me, it is a narrow and short-sighted policy which endeavours to raise a prejudice in this House against a project for encouraging rapid communication with the only country in the world with which we have a constant interchange of ideas and interests. The Italian Government has not as yet opened up Italy to the linen trade. France, I am glad to say, is improving in that respect. But America is the market of the North of Ireland. When I lately asked a gentleman (who, from his accent, did not appear to belong to Galway) the following question, "What interests you so much in this matter?" he answered me at once, "My pocket;" and a very fair answer it was. He said he felt the injustice that was done him. "Here I am," said he, "and the ships carry my goods past Ireland, they carry my letters past Ireland, and my money past Ireland; and because we have established a trade, and because America is our market, our rights are not to be respected." I told him to go to the noble Viscount and tell him all he had told me and I had no doubt he would satisfy him. But it is said, that the contract has been confirmed by the noble Viscount from an unworthy motive. But I do not believe the noble Viscount will get the support of Irish Conservative Gentlemen on my side of the House (and we are the majority) if they are asked to give their support to a policy which they do not understand. It is my duty to do justice to the noble Viscount, and to express my entire disbelief that he has restored the contract on any other grounds than those of justice and good policy. I trust that the House will affirm the decision of the Government; and if, in addition to benefiting the Empire at large, the arrangement will confer great service on Ireland, that is no reason to a just and enlightened mind why it should be unfavourably regarded.

Mr. Whitelands

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, My hon. Friend moved two Resolutions, or rather announced his intention of moving two Resolutions, but he tells us that he will not propose the first. It becomes us, then, following his precept, "to tread lightly on the ashes of the dead." My hon. Friend has launched against the present Government a charge, which is easily made, which always obtains cheers, and which pleases those who entertain very superficial and shallow notions of Government, and who are willing to adopt anything tending to disparage an Administration. He has said that the present Government, in adopting this Galway Contract to the extent we have, has committed, or attempted to commit, a great political job—namely, that we hope, and had reason to believe, that by adopting this contract we should obtain support from the Irish Members. He has, in that statement, certainly pronounced a double censure on the Government, because in the first place he impeaches our political morality, and in the next place he impeaches our political sagacity; because—and I would appeal on this point to my hon. Friend the late Irish Lord of the Treasury (Colonel White)—experience has shown, that if we did reckon on the support of Irish Members in adopting this contract, we have been more woefully deceived and disappointed than often falls to the lot of a Government of this country. But I entreat my hon. Friend, who brought forward the present Motion, to raise his views a little higher than that state of morality by which he seems disposed to judge of the actions of others. Cannot my hon. Friend imagine that it is possible for a Government, in dealing with a public question, to be influenced by legitimate public considerations of national advantage? Can he not believe it possible, that, in recommending to the House a confirmation of this contract, we may have been influenced by the desire to promote the interest of Ireland, one-third of the letters passing to America being sent from that country? Can he not imagine that, in looking to the state of the United Kingdom, we may have seen a large portion of the people inhabiting a country to which nature has denied many of the advantages this island enjoys, in which that abundance of coal which is the foundation of the manufacturing industry is in a great measure wanting, and where all local circumstances have been so arranged that in it the accumulations of national defence, the marine establishments of the Empire, are not placed. Ireland is a country where, though it has harbours in abundance, circumstances beyond the control and discretion of the Government of the day have so ordered it that there are not in it any of those great naval establishments which, in a considerable degree, contribute to the welfare and prosperity of the districts in which they are placed. Cannot my hon. Friend—if he would only enlarge his mind and liberate it from the narrow scope of consideration by which he seems actuated—can he not believe that the Government, whose duty it is to watch equally over the welfare of every part of the dominions of Her Majesty, may have been influenced (if an arrangement were presented to the consideration of the Government, calculated in the opinion of the Irish nation to contribute to their prosperity and welfare, and which, with a view to the benefit of the whole United Kingdom, would be useful and desirable) by considerations of the same sort, and not by such a flimsy hope as that of simply gaining support in this House. The best chance a Government has of obtaining support, not only in this House, but in the country, is to do the best they can to promote the interests of the whole Empire, including Ireland. That was one of the grounds on which the Government thought it right to adopt the course they have taken. My hon. Friend has argued this question as if no interests were concerned but those of Scotland and Liverpool. He has totally forgotten that Ireland is a part of the United Kingdom and has an interest in speedy communication and in getting its letters and goods transmitted across the Atlantic, independent of considerations which attach simply to the different ports of communication. It is a great evil for Irishmen to be compelled to come to England, when they want to go to America, or to wait for their letters from America until they are forwarded from England, or to send their goods from Ireland to England for transmission across the Atlantic, and any arrangement which gives them a more direct and ready communication between the western part of Ireland across the Atlantic and America must obviously be an advantage to Ireland, must tend to assist the development of the natural resources of the country, and to increase the commercial and, to a certain degree, the manufacturing prosperity of the country. These were the views of the Government on the general question with respect to this contract, which, if well carried out according to the engagements offered by the contractors, would contribute to the benefit of the Irish people. But there is another consideration which could not fail to prevail on the mind of any Government who had to deal with the question, and that is the consideration that the faith of one Government had been pledged, and the faith of Parliament had been pledged to a certain degree. A great number of Irish people—1,800 my hon. Friend stated—had embarked their limited means, their all, in this enterprise. Though no engagement may now exist, all this constituted some claim on the present Government, who would not have acted right in repudiating it, unless in the case of a great failure on the part of the Company to complete the conditions of their contract. At first they did fail, and no doubt their contract was at an end; but the Committee appointed by this House recommended the Company to the favourable consideration of the Government, and we certainly did think that if they should, by enlarged arrangements and by getting more capital at their command, fulfil the engagements they offered to enter into, it would be fair to the parties—to those whose only chance was making good the money they had invested—to renew the contract, from which they expected to derive some interest for their money. That is the way in which the question at present stands for their consideration. My hon. Friend calls on the House to do that which I think would be an act of great cruelty and injustice, to interpose and say that this contract should not be renewed but should be extinguished. In that case, whatever chance these unhappy 1,800 people had of retrieving their losses, and deriving some interest from their money, would be disappointed and their ruin complete. With respect to those who have invested their money in the enterprise, my hon. Friend thinks he will persuade this House to perform what I think an act of cruelty and injustice. I do not believe that this House will do anything of the sort. I believe that this House has a greater regard for political morality than my hon. Friend seems to give it credit for. I think it would be an act of political immorality and an arbitrary act if, in consequence of an abstract proposal, which my hon. Friend is afraid to submit to the decision of the House, and which he does not make the foundation of his second Resolution, the House were to call on the Government to crush all the hopes which these unhappy contributors to the enterprise may yet retain of realizing the profits of their investments, and were immediately to pass a Resolution putting an entire end to this Galway Contract. I say, that if the Company, whether consisting of preference shareholders or ordinary shareholders, can make good their engagements, I think that the good faith and pledges given by the Government in this House will lead the House to negative the Motion.

GENERAL UPTON said, that every person in the district of Belfast, and many in other parts, considered that the granting of this contract would lead to a great saving of expense and time in carrying the mails between this country and North America. Lines of railway had been formed and other enterprises entered upon in the expectation of good faith being kept in this matter by Government. He therefore hoped the decision of the House upon the Resolution would be in accordance with that which had been formed by the Government.

Question put, "That the words proposed be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 109; Noes 46: Majority 63.

Viscount Palmerston

Original Question again proposed.

MURDER OF MR. BRADDEL.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he rose to call attention to the circumstances connected with the assassination of Mr. Braddel, in July last, in the town of Tipperary. Mr. Braddel was the agent of an estate belonging to a gentleman residing in England. On the estate was a man named Hayes, who acted as a bailiff. This person was therefore well known to the people in that quarter, and no great admiration was entertained for his character. A son of Hayes was tried for murder and acquitted. On the conclusion of the trial, Mr. Braddel told him that he must either send the son away or quit the estate. In July, Mr. Braddel went to Tipperary to collect the rents. While sitting in a room of his hotel, with a bailiff named Moore, to receive the tenants, Hayes entered and pressed him to accept his rent. Braddel refused to take it. Hayes asked him a second and a third time, and then discharged a pistol at his breast. Three shots were fired in an hotel in the middle of the day, in a town of 6,000 inhabitants, and containing innumerable police, and yet the assassin escaped. Mr. Braddel named the man, but he did not believe the wound to be mortal. He locked his desk and proceeded to another house, where he believed he should be safe. A man named Moore was present during the scene; and when asked why he did not secure the murderer, he said he tried to hold him but was afraid of him. The consequence was that fifteen minutes elapsed before the alarm was given, and the pursuit was unsuccessful. Hayes was an elderly man, his person was well known; and although his crime might have raised him in the estimation of some, he was before this event very unpopular. He may have caught a railway train and have proceeded to Waterford and Liverpool. There were 1,000 policemen in that division of the county, and he had heard that an investigation had taken place into the conduct of two of their body, on the ground that the man was not arrested when it was possible. He had heard that one or two men were dismissed on this ground. He did not believe there was a body of police superior to that in Ireland. They were steady and veracious witnesses, and they generally found out a criminal. This, however, was a very remarkable case.

A strange story was current that Hayes was seen at Berehaven, and that he attempted to leave in a ship bound to America. The police were, however, on his track, and on pulling to the ship, it was said that Hayes was not on board and had been refused a passage. This was at a date long subsequent to the commission of the crime. Mr. Braddel lived forty minutes after receiving his wounds, but his thoughts ran not so much upon his murderer as upon his wife and children, in whose favour he desired to make a codicil to his will. He made a dying declaration, but owing to the cause above mentioned it was not in due form. He (Mr. Whiteside) did not impute to any one engaged in the administration of the law in Ireland a lukewarmness in bringing so detestable an assassin to justice. There was, however, no proof that he had left the country, and he certainly had not yet been arrested. The police in this case had command of the electric telegraph; they had the means of communicating with the various harbours on the coast, and they had notice of the crime fifteen minutes after its perpetration. He wished, therefore, to receive from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland some explanation of the conduct of the police and the Government in this matter.

MR. BAGWELL said, that the remarkable part of the case was that Hayes was well-known in the country, being a notorious character and greatly disliked from having been instrumental in carrying out a great number of ejections. Yet the man walked out of the hotel and might have sunk into the earth for anything that had since been heard of him. One policeman was dismissed for not arresting him—not that he believed he actually saw Hayes, but that he failed to apprehend a man whom he thought to be the murderer. Tipperary was very centrally situated in regard to railways, and thus the murderer had many facilities for escape. He happened, however, to be at the time at Queenstown, which was the principal port of embarkation, and he was told, that although the murder was committed at noon on Wednesday, and telegraphic communication existed, it was not until noon on Friday that the police at Queenstown had information of the assassination. He believed that a ship sailed for America on Thursday, the day after the murder, but there was no one to stop the assassin. Hayes was known to have £37 in his pocket, and he might have escaped by this vessel. All parties in Ireland had been entreating the Government, but in vain, to alter the system of police in that country. Numerous petitions had been presented to that House complaining of the whole organization of the police. Crimes were committed, but they were not found out. One of the finest body of men in the world had been converted into indifferent soldiers and bad policemen. Each policeman carried a rifle, which he could not use, and a sword bayonet a yard long, which got between his legs and threw him to the ground upon his attempting to run. The men were marched out at night in large bodies, and, encumbered as they were, could be heard a mile off. He trusted the Government would seriously consider the expediency of introducing some change into the organization of the police in Ireland. So long as they allowed the present system to continue, they would be morally guilty of all the murders perpetrated in that country.

CASE OF MICHAEL O'CONNOR.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. O'HARA said, that he desired, before the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland addressed the House, to call attention to another case in which justice had not been done. In September last there resided on his property in Sligo an elderly gentleman, named Davey, who had amassed a considerable fortune in the merchant service, and who had two daughters living with him. Both girls had been well educated in the Ursuline Convent, in the town of Sligo. On the 30th of September, about nine in the evening, a person named Michael O'Connor, accompanied by another man, went to Mr. Davey's house and attempted to carry off one of his daughters. He dragged her to the door and tried to force her into a car, but was obliged to drive away, leaving the girl lying on the road. The following morning he was apprehended by the police, taken before a magistrate, and ordered to be tried at the next petty sessions. Early on the morning of the 15th of October, which was the day before that fixed for his trial, he made a second attempt to abduct Elizabeth Davey. Accompanied by seven or eight men, all the worse for liquor, he broke into the house, threatened some of the inmates, and destroyed a good deal of property. There could be no doubt that his object was to carry off the girl, but she was concealed by the father, and so escaped. O'Connor was apprehended and fully committed for trial. The case being thought too serious to be tried at the sessions it was sent to the assizes. Meantime O'Connor was admitted to bail, and in the interim married the young woman. The assizes came on, and people were anxious to know what would become of O'Connor. The indictment found by the grand jury was for the abduction alone, and of course it could not stand, because the wife could not give evidence against her husband. The accused appeared, and the Crown prosecutor said, that as he had made amends and married the daughter with the father's consent, it would be sufficient if he were bound in his own recognizance, and O'Connor was bound accordingly in the sum of £100. His complaint was that the ends of justice had been defeated, first, by the admission of the man to bail, and secondly, by withholding the indictment against him for the more serious offence; and if the action of magistrates were to be completely overruled, as had happened in this instance, by persons in authority, the very worst possible results must ensue to the peace and good order of the country.

SIR ROBERT PEELE said, that he did not exactly understand the object of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. O'Hara) in submitting this case to the House. Apparently, no doubt, violence had been offered to this young woman. It was certainly a very serious crime to break into the house, but it appeared to him that the affair was rather a rough species of courtship—the young man being in love with the young woman; that the father opposed the match, and that an abduction was attempted. A second attack was made, and after that the young man married the young woman. He presumed that they were living happily together. The hon. Member complained of the young man being released on bail without the knowledge of the magistrates, and said the proceeding was an outrage on justice. But O'Connor appeared when called upon, and pleaded guilty to the charge; and he really could not see that there was any very great infringement of the principles of justice in his being admitted to bail after having been six weeks in prison. At all events the affair was, he hoped, happily finished, and he trusted that the young man would conduct himself properly for the future.

Coming next to the remarks made by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Whiteside), he was also unable to perceive very clearly what his object was in bringing forward the unfortunate murder of Mr. Braddel in July last. That case came before the House on two or three occasions last year, when he had endeavoured to explain, he hoped satisfactorily, that everything had been done by the Government in order to discover the known perpetrator of that most audacious offence. But up to the present time, as his right hon. Friend had truly said, the criminal had escaped them. What had become of him they did not know. All kinds of reports had been current, and every attempt been made to mislead the Government and the police. The right hon. Gentleman had clearly narrated the circumstances under which this awful tragedy took place in the town of Tipperary in the afternoon of a market day. It would seem that some of the persons present had acted a cowardly part, and that Hayes, a rather powerful man, succeeded in effecting his escape to the country. The case had given the Irish Government great anxiety, and no stone had been left unturned to bring the criminal to justice. In regard to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Clonmel, (Mr. Bagwell) he would only say, that although fifteen minutes elapsed between the commission of the offence and the police receiving an intimation of it, no time was lost in having the country scoured in every direction in search of the perpetrator. In this case, as unfortunately sometimes happened, the people of the neighbourhood aided with the murderer, or at least would give the police no information; otherwise a clue might have been obtained to his whereabouts, and he might have been arrested. Immediately the police found that they could get nothing to put them upon his track, they telegraphed to all the towns and ports of Ireland, as well as to Liverpool and Glasgow, in order, if possible, to intercept his flight. Much stress had been laid on the whereabouts of Hayes. One assertion was that he had escaped from Berehaven, or that, not being able to take a passage in a ship, he returned; another that he escaped from Galway immediately after the murder; another that he was confined in a building underground somewhere in King's or Queen's County. These various statements had, of course, been made by interested parties for the purpose of misleading the Government; but he was bound to say that he did not think the police were at all to blame in the matter. The right hon. Gentleman had passed a just panegyric on their conduct. It was not only an admirable force, but it had very much contributed to the comparatively peaceful state of Ireland. He did not know what Baron Hughes might have said at Clonmel, but in the north and north-west the reports of the Judges had been most satisfactory. In some cases murderers did unhappily escape the powers of human justice, and this was one of those cases; Lord Norbury's murderer remained unknown to this day, although thousands of pounds had been offered for his discovery. In this country also the famous Road murder and the murder in Waterloo Road were still mysteries unsolved; and so in the case of Hayes, although a man most remarkable in stature and of very considerable age, he had managed, up to the present time, to elude apprehension. But he believed confidently that Hayes was not dead—that he was still somewhere concealed in Ireland, and although it was impossible to have any accurate data on the subject, the constabulary, on whom the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside) had pronounced a eulogium, had yet hopes of finding him. Letters had been received from America stating that Hayes was there, but in the present state of that country it was impossible to get accurate information such as under other circumstances they might make available. With regard to the conduct of a policeman who had been dismissed by the Government because it was asserted that he saw Hayes on a particular day, and that he refused to arrest him, the facts were these:—Shortly after the murder two constables, named Costigan and Hughes, asserted on oath that they saw Hayes. Hughes would not himself arrest Hayes, when he said he could do so, and forbade Costigan, who volunteered to do so or to fetch assistance. These points were submitted to an inquiry on oath by the justices at Clonmel, and the finding of those justices was this: "We are of opinion that both the above charges are proved." But though they declared the charges against the constables proved, they gave no opinion as to whether Hughes acted prudently or otherwise; and therefore they left it to the Government to decide what course should be taken in regard to him. He had read the papers most attentively, and he had come to the conclusion that in the interest of the public Hughes had failed to do his duty, and that he should be dismissed; and dismissed he was. But it had since come out that he did not see Hayes. That, however, did not alter his view of the case, for Hughes swore that he saw him. He had acted on his sole authority because the Court declined to give an opinion, but he was quite sure that the public would say that he had acted rightly. Their military equipment had frequently been made a charge against the constabulary, but he should be very sorry to see any alteration in that respect. Their present armament and dress did not in the least interfere with the efficient performance of their duty. A report had just been received by the Government of a case in which a constable had been in pursuit for twenty miles across country, and yet his dagger and gun did not in the least encumber him, for he captured his man. Besides, his hon. Friend knew that in addition to the constabulary there was a force of detectives in every county of Ireland, who went silently and prudently about their business. If he had known the reports which had come to the Government within the last year, when the constabulary had rather hard times of it, the hon. Gentleman would not find fault with them. They were still taking active steps. Hundreds of men had been on foot solely for the purpose of discovering Hayes; and he might just mention, to show the extreme activity of the police, what had been done in the case of the murder of Mr. Fitzgerald. Two assassins were hired to shoot him; he was shot dead; nobody was present but the wife. The assassins shot their victim from behind a hedge, and ran off immediately. One was immediately brought to justice, and executed. The other was also brought to justice, and suffered the extreme penalty of the law; and only within the last few days the police had been able to trace the man who hired the two assassins; he was found guilty at the recent Limerick Assizes, and would suffer the extreme penalty of the law on the 15th of next month. He did not think, therefore, that the charge of inefficiency was well-founded because the police had not been able to bring the heinous criminal Hayes to justice.

Mr. O'Hara

Another Question had been put to him by his hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry, with reference to the Law of Marriage in Ireland. No one knew better than the right hon. Gentleman, who introduced a Bill last year for the purpose of assisting the Dissenters of Ireland, the difficulties of dealing with this subject. They all admitted that the Marriage Law of Ireland was in an unsatisfactory position. It was based, not on the civil rights of parties, but rather, as it were, on religious differences. That was a great objection, which certainly ought to be dealt with. They had in Ireland a state of things which it was very difficult to deal with. There was a law of marriage for Protestants, a law of marriage for Roman Catholics, another for Presbyterians, Quakers, and Jews. It was a complex system to treat in one uniform measure. There were at the present time three Bills before the House relating to the subject, which alone would prove the extreme difficulty of dealing with it. It was said that the Government should take up the subject, and he should be very glad to do so if he could perceive any prospect of dealing with it in a satisfactory manner, having regard to the conscientious scruples of persons of different religious persuasions. He, however, did not think that was possible at the present moment. His right hon. Friend opposite had failed to carry a Bill bearing his name, and not only that, but had violently attacked the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Mr. Whiteside), whose name also was on the back of the Bill. [Mr. WHITESIDE: I made no violent attack.] He had heard the right hon. Gentleman differ from his hon. and learned Friend, particularly as to the hours of marriage. That was a very important point, and such differences showed the difficulty of dealing with the subject. He could only say, that if the Bill now before Parliament should fail, and he should continue in office, he would endeavour next Session to introduce a measure which would meet the wishes of all parties. He would not go into a history of the Marriage Laws in Ireland from the time of Henry VIII., which would occupy too much time, but would only remark that from that period until 1822, very severe restrictions had been imposed upon the Roman Catholics. Of late years there had been some modification, and it was very desirable to bring the whole system into harmonious action, but at the present moment the Government had no intention of dealing with the question.

ARMY CLOTHING.—OBSERVATIONS.

COLONEL DICKSON said, the system of Sir Robert Peel

police in Ireland was a most pernicious one. The right hon. Baronet had talked about certain cases of murder in England remaining undiscovered, but he seemed to forget that that state of things was the exception in England. As to the police in Ireland having been instrumental in the arrest of the murderers of Mr. Fitzgerald, he gave the statement the most unqualified contradiction. Having made that statement, he would turn to the subject which he had placed on the notice paper, which was to call the attention of the Secretary of State for War to the fact that the Clothing made up at the Factory at Pimlico was not subjected to the same inspection as that supplied by contract, and to other matters connected with that establishment. He did this in no hostility to the War Office, or in any hostility to the Clothing Establishment itself. He had, however, to protest against the gradual increase of the establishment, to the injury of the general trade in shutting out those great contracting establishments which had already done good service to the country. The expense of the establishment at Pimlico was not less than £70,000, or 13 per cent upon the value of the work produced, which was £560,000 last year. He had that day heard that it was intended that the establishment should supply the clothing to the Volunteers; and if that were the case, the trade would be most seriously injured, while the cost of the establishment would be enormously increased. What he had to complain of was, that although they had an Inspector General of Clothing, he did not inspect it. He ought to inspect the clothing supplied by the Government manufactory, as well as that supplied by contractors. He had been informed that Mr. Tate, the contractor at Limerick, had in June last supplied 800 tunics for the 20th Regiment. He had himself taken one of those tunics to an army contractor, who had pronounced it to be the best soldier's tunic he had ever seen. When these tunics arrived at the Government Factory the shoulder-straps and buttons were cut off and placed on the tunics made in the factory, which were sent down to the regiment; but they were there found so defective that the commanding officer had to apply to head-quarters for extra linen stuff to remedy the defects, and the matter was hushed up. What he contended for was, not that the Government should abolish its factories, but that a fair proportion of the work should be given out to be made by private firms.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the tender of the contractor in Limerick had been accepted this year, and his work approved. With respect to the Establishment in Pimlico, as the Vote for it had been passed, it would be useless to enter into details in defence of that Vote, but were it necessary to do so, he could show by figures that the effect of the maintenance of the establishment to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel Dickson) objected, had been to reduce the price paid to contractors and to supply the troops with clothing at a cheaper rate and more advantageously than under the former system. It was a great establishment, principally for the purpose of inspection. A large part of the work was executed outside the establishment by persons in their own homes. He did not know how the hon. and gallant Gentleman made out that the establishment cost £70,000 per annum. The annual charge was only £8,400, but as much as £20,000 was appropriated this year for buildings.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that he concurred with his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Dickson) in thinking the Pimlico establishment an expensive one, but had no doubt that Colonel Daubney's was a fair inspection.

DEFENCES AT YARMOUTH.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR HENRY TRACEY said, that he had given notice of a Motion, stating it to be the opinion of the House that Yarmouth Roadstead should be fully protected from the attack of gunboats at sea, but he found that he could not move it now. He should therefore confine himself to calling attention to the subject. In consequence of representations made by the town in 1859 as to the defenceless state of the roadstead, the Secretary for War, the late Lord Herbert, had an inspection made by engineers and others competent to investigate the matter. They reported that there never was a port which required more defence. It was determined to erect three batteries, but only two had been constructed. In reply to an application made to the War Office in 1860, Lord de Grey and Ripon said the Government required a site for the remaining battery. A site was procured and paid for. There was then a delay, which was explained by the omission from the Estimates of any Vote for the works. On the 12th of December, 1862, the mayor of the town wrote to the War Office on the subject, and, in reply, was informed that his letter should be considered, but that Sir George Lewis did not propose to erect any works in Yarmouth "at present." The right hon. Gentleman, in a conversation, had stated that he was not so great a man for fortifications as his predecessor; but he might observe, that the opinion of Lord Herbert on fortifications was as good as that of most Secretaries of State, and perhaps as that of the right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary for War. His predecessor, the late Lord Herbert, had pledged himself that the work should be carried out; and, under all the circumstances, he hoped the Government would not commit a breach of faith in the matter.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS rose to reply, but was called to order, having once spoken.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY begged to ask whether the Galway Contract would be laid on the table for a month before it was ratified, in accordance with the Resolution of the Select Committee, or whether the Government intended to treat it as an old contract which had not expired? The hon. Baronet begged to complain of the practice which had grown up lately of going into Committee on Friday nights. He did not know whether the right hon. Baronet, Sir George Lewis, meant to go into Committee to-night, seeing that it was past ten o'clock, and there was barely a House; but it certainly was an abuse of the change made for the convenience of the Government when Thursday was made a Supply night. Formerly Friday night was, to a considerable extent, occupied by questions on the adjournment; and when the Thursday was made a Supply night, the Order of Supply was retained on the Papers on Friday, in order to give an opportunity for the usual miscellaneous discussion. To-night there were thirteen different topics on the paper for discussion, and no one could tell whether they would not consume the entire night. The consequence was, that hon. Gentlemen who took an interest in financial matters were perplexed what to do, and the House ran the risk of passing a number of important Votes without discussion, and of gaining a reputation of being neglectful of the public money. Last year 103 items, involving £5,000,000 of public money, had been passed through Committee after ten o'clock, and hon. Gentlemen who took an interest in financial matters did not know that Supply was coming on.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £321,884, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Volunteers, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864, inclusive."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, in reply to the latter observations of Sir Henry Willoughby, with reference to going into Committee of Supply at this time of night, he had a distinct recollection that when the change was made from the former to the present practice, there was a clear understanding that the Government were to be at liberty to go into Supply on Friday, if the time of night permitted. The question then was, whether it was proper to go into Supply at ten o'clock at night. And he never heard it objected that it was not right to go into Supply at that time. In fact, it was usual to do so. With regard to the Volunteer Vote, there was an increase of £199,000 this year, owing to a proposal of Government, founded on the Report of the Royal Commission, recommending the increased grant which he now submitted. The opinion of that Commission was, that the Volunteer force had reached a stage at which a certain part of it would dissolve unless it received some subsidy from the country. He did not know whether that was in the shape of censure; but inasmuch as the force was supplied by the voluntary contributions and the volunteer services of members, it seemed natural that after a number of years the zeal which originally animated it should somewhat cool, and the expense be regarded as heavy. In 1801, when a former great Volunteer movement took place, the country came to the assistance of the Volunteers at a much earlier period, and to a much greater extent than at present. The plan of the Commission was that there should be a grant in aid of Volunteer regiments to be calculated on the principle of a capitation charge; not that a sum should be paid to each individual, but that a sum, determined by the number of Volunteers, should be paid to the adjutant to be disbursed by him, and account for the same to the War Department. The proposed capitation was to all Volunteers, except the artillery Volunteers, 20s. per man who passed a certain scale of drill; another 10s. per man to those who passed a certain portion of musketry instruction; and 30s. per man to the artillery. The purposes to which these allowances were to be applied were head-quarters, drill-ground, care and repair of arms, cost of instruction, and cost and conveyance of clothing. And this was the only increased expenditure, on account of the Volunteers, in the Army Estimates for the year.

LORD LOVAINE said, that he thought the amount of the proposed Vote rather alarming. At first it was not imagined that any expense of the Volunteers would have to be defrayed by the country, except for arms and ammunition and staff serjeants. Well, the first grant was £88,000, the next £133,000, the next £172,000, and the present £321,000 odd. But were the Committee to grant sums of money to bodies of men who performed no service for the amount? We had it from high authority that in cases of public disturbance the Volunteers could not be brought out with arms; nay, more, that their presence was a positive source of danger. He had seen it stated that when a riot broke out in Birkenhead, so far from the Volunteers being able to stem it, they were, on being called out, obliged to take their rifles to pieces, and put the barrels on one side and the locks on the other, in order to prevent the mob from getting hold of them. He did not impugn the spirit and patriotism of the Volunteers, but in moving the reduction of the Vote he claimed the assistance of hon. Members below the gangway on the Ministerial side of the House; because they must admit either that the danger which called the Volunteers into existence still continued, and that it was therefore necessary to maintain them, or that the danger was past, and that the Volunteers must therefore be left to support themselves. They were going to spend upon the Volunteers more than the cost of the transport service of the regular army; and to cripple that service was to detain in India beyond the time for relief, and to shorten the life of, the regular soldier, who was worth more than the Volunteer. He moved that the Vote be reduced by the amount of the capitation grant, £154,579.

Sir Henry Willoughby

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £267,308, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Volunteers, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864, inclusive."

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that the noble Lord complained of the expenditure of £154,000 upon the Volunteer force, but he made no complaint of the expenditure of £14,000,000 upon the regular army. He thought that no one of the Votes which had been submitted to the House was more economical than this. But the real secret of the noble Lord's objection had crept out. The noble Lord thought that the Volunteer force was a dangerous one.

LORD LOVAINE said, that he had never considered the Volunteer force as dangerous.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that no danger was to be apprehended from putting arms into the hands of the middle classes of the community. He hoped the Committee would not be led aside by the noble Lord from doing their duty towards the Volunteer body.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, that the question was, whether the Volunteer force was a useful body or not. He was one of the Royal Commissioners who had to consider this subject, and one of their inquiries was whether or not the Volunteer force was likely to dwindle away unless this Vote of money were made. The Commissioners thought that would be the case. They found, also, that there was no other way than this of getting a class of men to serve their country without pecuniary assistance. The Volunteers included in their ranks a body of men who would never volunteer into the ranks of the army, navy, or militia. He thought, if this money were voted, it would not be thrown away. At a comparatively small expense a most valuable supplementary force would be obtained to the regular service of the country.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, that he agreed that this was one of the most economical Votes that had been proposed to this House. He thought nothing was more creditable to the Volunteers than that they came forward at the hour when they thought they might by possibility be required for the defence of their country, and then, when the danger was passed, they were ready to relinquish their military duties and return to their ordinary occupations. But the truth was the country had found the advantage of these men, and it would be most unwise to sacrifice a body whose fidelity to their country had been so conspicuous. He thought the Volunteers were a most reasonable class of men. They had given up their time, which to them was money, and more than money, because it involved the sacrifice of many comforts. He thought the Volunteers ought to get their uniform cloth at cost price, and he thought that such a grant would be received by the Volunteers with much gratitude. With regard to the adjutants, he would observe that there were 160 adjutants for the disembodied militia, being an average as compared with the number of men of 35½ per cent. The average of adjutants for the yeomanry cavalry was 20 per cent. For the Volunteer force he found there were 280 adjutants. He thought a less percentage of adjutant officers might be sufficient for the education of Volunteers, who were considered to be a class superior to the militia in point of intelligence and education.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that the speech of the noble Lord (Lord Lovaine) would be received with unanimous dissent by all classes in this country. The Volunteers came forward at a moment of emergency, or supposed emergency, and he did not believe that the country would grudge the expense necessary to keep up so valuable a force in an efficient state. There was considerable advantage in keeping up the military spirit of the nation; and as the Volunteers contributed to this end, he thought they ought to be supported to a fair and reasonable extent.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that things constantly happened in that House which occasioned much surprise. This evening they had had a discussion about the Galway subsidy of £78,000, and yet here was a proposal made with the greatest coolness for a grant of £160,000, or £1 ahead, to gentlemen for their patriotism. They talked of jobbery. What was jobbery? The hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Williams), said this patriotism was very cheap at the price. Well, he did not think that the Volunteers had any present military value. Dressing a man in a sheet of blotting-paper, carrying a dirty musket, and taking up four times as much ground as the regular troops, would not make a man a soldier; and he was sure the people of Ireland would laugh when they read how passed through Committee after ten o'clock, and hon. Gentlemen who took an interest in financial matters did not know that Supply was coming on.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £321,884, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Volunteers, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864, inclusive."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, in replying to the latter observations of Sir Henry Willoughby, with reference to going into Committee of Supply at this time of night, he had a distinct recollection that when the change was made from the former to the present practice, there was a clear understanding that the Government were to be at liberty to go into Supply on Friday, if the time of night permitted. The question then was, whether it was proper to go into Supply at ten o'clock at night. And he never heard it objected that it was not right to go into Supply at that time. In fact, it was usual to do so. With regard to the Volunteer Vote, there was an increase of £199,000 this year, owing to a proposal of Government, founded on the Report of the Royal Commission, recommending the increased grant which he now submitted. The opinion of that Commission was, that the Volunteer force had reached a stage at which a certain part of it would dissolve unless it received some subsidy from the country. He did not know whether that was in the shape of censure; but inasmuch as the force was supplied by the voluntary contributions and the volunteer services of members, it seemed natural that after a number of years the zeal which originally animated it should somewhat cool, and the expense be regarded as heavy. In 1801, when a former great Volunteer movement took place, the country came to the assistance of the Volunteers at a much earlier period, and to a much greater extent than at present. The plan of the Commission was that there should be a grant in aid of Volunteer regiments to be calculated on the principle of a capitation charge; not that a sum should be paid to each individual, but that a sum, determined by the number of Volunteers, should be paid to the adjutant to be disbursed by him, and account for the same to the War Department. The proposed capitation was to all Volunteers, except the artillery Volunteers, 20s. per man who passed a certain scale of drill; another 10s. per man to those who passed a certain portion of musketry instruction; and 30s. per man to the artillery. The purposes to which these allowances were to be applied were head-quarters, drill-ground, care and repair of arms, cost of instruction, and cost and conveyance of clothing. And this was the only increased expenditure, on account of the Volunteers, in the Army Estimates for the year.

LORD LOVAINE said, that he thought the amount of the proposed Vote rather alarming. At first it was not imagined that any expense of the Volunteers would have to be defrayed by the country, except for arms and ammunition and staff serjeants. Well, the first grant was £88,000, the next £133,000, the next £172,000, and the present £321,000 odd. But were the Committee to grant sums of money to bodies of men who performed no service for the amount? We had it from high authority that in cases of public disturbance the Volunteers could not be brought out with arms; nay, more, that their presence was a positive source of danger. He had seen it stated that when a riot broke out in Birkenhead, so far from the Volunteers being able to stem it, they were, on being called out, obliged to take their rifles to pieces, and put the barrels on one side and the locks on the other, in order to prevent the mob from getting hold of them. He did not impugn the spirit and patriotism of the Volunteers, but in moving the reduction of the Vote he claimed the assistance of hon. Members below the gangway on the Ministerial side of the House; because they must admit either that the danger which called the Volunteers into existence still continued, and that it was therefore necessary to maintain them, or that the danger was past, and that the Volunteers must therefore be left to support themselves. They were going to spend upon the Volunteers more than the cost of the transport service of the regular army; and to cripple that service was to detain in India beyond the time for relief, and to shorten the life of, the regular soldier, who was worth more than the Volunteer. He moved that the Vote be reduced by the amount of the capitation grant, £154,579.

Sir Henry Willoughby

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £267,308, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Volunteers, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864, inclusive."

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that the noble Lord complained of the expenditure of £154,000 upon the Volunteer force, but he made no complaint of the expenditure of £14,000,000 upon the regular army. He thought that no one of the Votes which had been submitted to the House was more economical than this. But the real secret of the noble Lord's objection had crept out. The noble Lord thought that the Volunteer force was a dangerous one.

LORD LOVAINE said, that he had never considered the Volunteer force as dangerous.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that no danger was to be apprehended from putting arms into the hands of the middle classes of the community. He hoped the Committee would not be led aside by the noble Lord from doing their duty towards the Volunteer body.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, that the question was, whether the Volunteer force was a useful body or not. He was one of the Royal Commissioners who had to consider this subject, and one of their inquiries was whether or not the Volunteer force was likely to dwindle away unless this Vote of money were made. The Commissioners thought that would be the case. They found, also, that there was no other way than this of getting a class of men to serve their country without pecuniary assistance. The Volunteers included in their ranks a body of men who would never volunteer into the ranks of the army, navy, or militia. He thought, if this money were voted, it would not be thrown away. At a comparatively small expense a most valuable supplementary force would be obtained to the regular service of the country.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, that he agreed that this was one of the most economical Votes that had been proposed to this House. He thought nothing was more creditable to the Volunteers than that they came forward at the hour when they thought they might by possibility be required for the defence of their country, and then, when the danger was passed, they were ready to relinquish their military duties and return to their ordinary occupations. But the truth was the country had found the advantage of these men, and it would be most unwise to sacrifice a body whose fidelity to their country had been so conspicuous. He thought the Volunteers were a most reasonable class of men. They had given up their time, which to them was money, and more than money, because it involved the sacrifice of many comforts. He thought the Volunteers ought to get their uniform cloth at cost price, and he thought that such a grant would be received by the Volunteers with much gratitude. With regard to the adjutants, he would observe that there were 160 adjutants for the disembodied militia, being an average as compared with the number of men of 35½ per cent. The average of adjutants for the yeomanry cavalry was 20 per cent. For the Volunteer force he found there were 280 adjutants. He thought a less percentage of adjutant officers might be sufficient for the education of Volunteers, who were considered to be a class superior to the militia in point of intelligence and education.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that the speech of the noble Lord (Lord Lovaine) would be received with unanimous dissent by all classes in this country. The Volunteers came forward at a moment of emergency, or supposed emergency, and he did not believe that the country would grudge the expense necessary to keep up so valuable a force in an efficient state. There was considerable advantage in keeping up the military spirit of the nation; and as the Volunteers contributed to this end, he thought they ought to be supported to a fair and reasonable extent.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that things constantly happened in that House which occasioned much surprise. This evening they had had a discussion about the Galway subsidy of £78,000, and yet here was a proposal made with the greatest coolness for a grant of £160,000, or £1 ahead, to gentlemen for their patriotism. They talked of jobbery. What was jobbery? The hon. Member for Lambeth (Mr. Williams), said this patriotism was very cheap at the price. Well, he did not think that the Volunteers had any present military value. Dressing a man in a sheet of blotting-paper, carrying a dirty musket, and taking up four times as much ground as the regular troops, would not make a man a soldier; and he was sure the people of Ireland would laugh when they read how the House began with the discussion of the Galway subsidy, and ended with voting this money for the English Volunteers.

COLONEL NORTH begged to ask whether it was not worth £1 a head to instil military ideas into men who, in case of invasion, would admittedly be relied upon as soldiers. The bounty would not be received by the Volunteers themselves, but was mainly intended to overcome the difficulty of bringing members of administrative battalions together in rural districts—a difficulty which was exceedingly great when they had to travel thirty or forty miles to attend drill. Without discussing the amount of room required by a Volunteer battalion to move in, he maintained that the aptitude exhibited in learning their drill, and the precision with which their movements were executed, were astonishing, and it was impossible for any old soldier to refuse them his admiration. As to making them perfectly disciplined soldiers, that could only be done by the continuous discipline of the barrack yard; and if the amount of time requisite for that purpose were demanded at their hands, it would be necessary to pay, not £300,000, but £3,000,000. To the Volunteers their time was money, and he believed they cheerfully sacrificed as much of it as was consistent with their other engagements, for frequently the men were not their own masters. They were an honourable force, and one that it was a pleasure to command.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that there had been no falling-off in the payments from enrolled members, but the public had ceased to give subscriptions as freely as they used to do. The question was whether it was worth while to pay the sum proposed in order to retain 150,000 men as part of the permanent defences of the country.

MR. DILLWYN said, that he was one of those who thought, that while we did not need any more soldiers for the purpose of aggression, we certainly for years required a force for defence. The Volunteers supplied that want, and were at once efficient and cheap; and that was the reason why they received the support of Gentlemen below the gangway.

MR. BUXTON said, that he was happy to say that in the battalion he commanded, consisting entirely of working men, there was as much zeal as ever. Since it had become known that the Government grant would enable the corps to reduce its expenses 170 recruits had joined its ranks. He felt grateful to the Government for having proposed a measure without which it would have been impossible for the force to keep together.

MR. JACKSON begged to state, that in the case of the riot, or rather row, referred to, which had occurred at Birkenhead between the Orangemen and the Roman Catholic mob, the Volunteers were not in a position to use their muskets, even if such a course had become necessary; they were acting as special constables merely, and an order was made by the magistrates, with the concurrence of Lieut.-Colonel King, that the nipples should be taken off for the purpose of rendering the muskets useless to either of the contending parties.

MR. ADDINGTON said, that he thought the efficiency of the Volunteer force was greatly exaggerated. There were not more than 50,000 thoroughly efficient Volunteers in the kingdom. The Volunteer force in the country districts fell far short of the efficiency which might be seen in the Volunteers of towns. It was incumbent on the Government to see that the money voted by Parliament was spent in making them really efficient.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that he thought the objections which had been made to the Volunteer force and its efficiency had been satisfactorily answered. If it were assumed that the regular force available for the service of the country did not amount to much more than 40,000 bayonets, it was impossible to conceive a more efficient auxiliary body at a less expense than the Volunteer force. With regard to the number of the Volunteers, he had it on authentic information that there were on the muster-roll 157,000 men, of whom 138,000 might be considered effective.

LORD LOVAINE begged to explain that what he had said was, that the arms of the Volunteers were a source of danger. The Volunteers could not act as military men in case of riot; but if there were soldiers present, they could. He would not trouble the Committee to divide, but would merely enter his protest against what he considered an unnecessary piece of extravagance, and would leave it to those Gentlemen who were always anxious for economy with regard to the regular army to justify themselves in voting so large a sum for 170,000 men who were not soldiers in time of peace, and could only be converted into soldiers in time of war.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £55,847, Enrolled Pensioners and Army Reserve.

COLONEL DUNNE begged to ask what was the nature of the latter body.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the reserve force received a sort of retaining fee, and attended a certain number of drills in the year.

COLONEL NORTH said, that it was a very useful force.

In reply to Lord WILLIAM GRAHAM,

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that there was a stoppage from the soldier's pay for washing sheets. He was rather opposed to those small stoppages, but the present one involved a considerable sum in the aggregate, and did not press heavily on the individuals who paid it.

Vote agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £956,365, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Manufacturing Departments, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864, inclusive."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that there was a large decrease under this head as compared with last year. A short time since the contract with the Elswick factory was terminated, in consequence of the inability of the Government to supply the company with a sufficient amount of orders to render the works profitable to the company. The diminution of orders was due to the fact that while the present ordnance experiments were going on, the Government did not like to proceed with the rapid manufacture of cannon. By the terms of their contract with the Elswick Company they were bound to make compensation if the works were not profitable, and under these circumstances they deemed it better to pay the forfeit and put an end to the contract. Sir W. Armstrong had thereupon resigned his post as head of the Ordnance Factory, because he wished to be perfectly free from all connection with the Government, and to devote himself entirely to the Elswick factory. This change would necessitate a revision of the existing arrangements in the Department, and an opportunity would be afforded of correcting certain abuses of the old system. It was a most important question whether the Government should maintain manufac-ories of its own or employ contractors. In discussing that question some confusion arose from the application of abstract principles of political economy to circumstances wherein some modification was required. In general, the Government could not employ contractors with advantage unless the article to be produced was one for which there was a natural demand, and which was required not merely by the Government but by the general public. Clothing, for instance, came under that category. In the case of iron ordnance, however, there was no general demand. No one wanted that commodity, except our own or perhaps a Foreign Government. The consequence was, that if a contractor undertook to supply the Government with guns, it was necessary to enter into a special contract, either to take a certain quantity of guns in the course of the year, or to advance a sum for plant and fixed expenses, or else in some other manner to maintain the contractor in his special manufacture. Thus a contractor, producing an article for which there was no general demand, became almost a Government manufacturer, and would scarcely be considered in the light of a free and independent contractor. On the other hand, articles like clothing, in proportion as they admitted of verification by inspection, might be supplied by private manufacture. There was an exception in the case of shoes, since soles might be filled up with an inferior article and might not be quite solid. The practice, therefore, was to cut up one or two pairs here and there to see if the soles were perfectly made. As a general rule, however, articles for which there was a natural demand, and which admitted of being verified by inspection, ought almost invariably to be supplied by contractors. Where, on the contrary, the article was one for which there was no natural demand, and one of which the Government were exclusive purchasers, and where also the inspection could not be verified, a Government factory was more economical and advantageous than a supply by contractors. If this principle were sound, the House would see that the Factory at Woolwich had not undergone any unjustifiable enlargement, and that the Government would be better supplied by its own factory in this instance than by employing contractors.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that the question raised by the Secretary at War was rather too important to be discussed at half past eleven at night. He had given notice of a Motion for reducing the grant to these Establishments, and should propose a small reduction in the present Vote to enable the Committee to consider the effect of the Government manufactures upon the public expenditure. He agreed in the principle that there were certain articles which it was desirable to produce by Government factories. But it was well Parliament should know how this source of Government expenditure was increasing. Previous to the amalgamation of the War Office with the Ordnance, this expenditure was very small. It had, however, gone on gradually increasing from about £15,000 in 1855, until it was now about £30,000. The present Vote was considerably reduced since last year, but there had been no reduction in the establishments. It appeared that Sir William Armstrong had wisely retired from a position inconsistent with his other pursuits, and his retirement left perfectly open the question of the reduction of the establishment with which that Gentleman had been connected. Did the right hon. Gentleman propose to appoint another person in his place; and, if so, on what terms? Were the Committee aware of the immense expenditure employed for wages and stores in the manufactories supplying the army and navy? During the last two years the items of wages and stores for the army and navy amounted to not less than £15,120,000. In the present year there was a considerable reduction in the stores, but no reduction in the establishments, and that was the point to which he wished to direct the attention of the Committee. If they meant to reduce the stores, they should act on the same principle, and reduce the establishments as well. The witnesses who gave their evidence before the Committee on Military Organization, and who were likely to form a sound opinion, thought this system of manufacturing had been carried too far. Sir Benjamin Hawes was in favour of relying more on private enterprise, and less on public establishments, and did not believe that the contract system had had a fair trial. The House had not the accounts of the store branches and the manufacturing branches before it. Without that information, and particularly without balance sheets, it was impossible for them to know what they were about when voting these large sums. Messrs. Anderson and Arbuthnot, well-known gentlemen, whose evidence was conclusive on matters of finance, stated that the system was entirely unsatisfactory in the store branch. The late Lord Herbert admitted that proper financial control was wanting; and there could be no doubt that the accounts were faulty and unsound both in the store and the manufacturing departments. Unless they took stock and knew the prices of the articles so as to be able to tell whether they cost more than those produced by private manufacturers, the basis of any correct system of accounts must be entirely wanting, and they must be left, on these points, as Mr. Anderson said, "very much in the dark." He did not wish to make any violent change, but a moderate limitation of these establishments. His complaint against the system was; that it did not give them the cost. He should like to know the expense of the artillery and gun factory for the last two years. The accounts were radically faulty, and the same remark applied to some extent to the gun-carriage department. But the foundation of the whole, the valuation of the store, was a perfect blank at the time when Captain Gordon gave his evidence. What he now proposed was that a small reduction should be made upon the sum of £35,871 for the nine establishments embraced within this Vote. He would therefore move that that amount be diminished by £2,000. At all events, before they were called upon to agree to this large Vote the right hon. Gentleman ought to afford them some explanations of the system carried on in these establishments.

Sir Henry Willoughby

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Item of £35,871 be reduced by the sum of £2,000."

LORD LOVAINE begged to ask for explanation respecting certain other details of the Vote.

COLONEL DUNNE thought that the first thing the Government ought to do was to inform the country what amount of stores was necessary, and could be obtainable, in the event of war. There were certain articles which the Government could obtain much better from contractors than from their own factories. There were, however, some other articles which the Government could better manufacture than any other parties. Gun-carriages and guns, for example, could be better obtained from our Government arsenals than from the hands of contractors. But why should clothing be made by the Government factories? What was the use of sending articles, that came into the hands of the Government from all parts of the kingdom, to be tested at Pimlico? All these arrangements went far to swell the Estimates.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, that he thought it impossible to pass the large Vote under consideration at that advanced period of the night. Nevertheless, he wished to say a few words upon the Vote for Warlike Stores, and to read extracts from the Evidence given before the Committee which sat on this subject, to show that it was more economical for the Government to manufacture for the public service than to obtain the necessary stores from contractors. He hoped the Committee would require from the right hon. Baronet (Sir George Grey) an explanation of his ominous words, "a new system of inspection," spoken of by him.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that there were in the War Office audited accounts of each Department; and if the hon. Baronet (Sir James Fergusson) would move for them, they should be produced. He did not propose any increase of expenditure for inspection at Woolwich Arsenal.

To report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported on Monday next.

Committee also report Progress; to sit again on Monday next.

ROMAN CATHOLIC MARRIAGES REGISTRATION (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Butt, Bill to permit the Registration of Roman Catholic Marriages in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Butt and Sir GEORGE BOWEN.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 73].

OFFICE OF SECRETARY AT WAR ABOLITION BILL.

On Motion of Sir George Lewis, Bill to abolish the office of Secretary at War, and to transfer the duties of that office to one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, ordered to be brought in by Sir GEORGE LEWIS and The JUDGE ADVOCATE.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 72].

OATHS RELIEF IN CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. E. Craufurd, Bill to give relief to Persons who may refuse or be unwilling, from alleged conscientious motives, to be sworn in Criminal Proceedings in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. EDWARD CRAUFURD, Mr. CRUM- EWING, and Mr. BAXTER.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 74].

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, March 23, 1863.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Trustees (Scotland) Act Amendment (No. 53); Alkali Works Regulation (No. 55). Committee—Illegitimate Children (Ireland) (No. 50); Consolidated Fund (£10,000,000) (No. 46). Report—Salmon Exportation (No. 51); Consolidated Fund (£10,000,000) (No. 48).

UNITED STATES.

THE SOUTHERN CONFEDERACY.

LORD CAMPBELL, in rising to call attention to the question of acknowledging the Southern Confederacy as an independent Power, in concert with other neutral States, and to the Despatches of Mr. Mason, the Southern Envoy, on the subject, said: My Lords, although I know that no apology is requisite for calling the attention of the House to the papers for which I moved in August last, and which have lately been presented, I am anxious and impatient to point out the exact view with which the Motion is submitted to you. It is not in order to raise a question on the course which Government have taken as regards American affairs during the autumn. The question I propose is wholly seated in the future. The facts which lead to it are known and easy to recall to you. During the whole of the last Session France and Great Britain were alleged, and were believed to act together on the difficulties which the civil war gave rise to. Since then they have diverged, or rather in the memorable phrase of a noble Friend now absent from his place (Lord Clarendon), although their objects are the same, have seemed to drift from one another. In November we restrained the French Government in a course which they desired to take; in January the Emperor by himself pursued a second line of action, meant, like the first, to terminate hostilities. That line of action having failed, all thoughts of intervention, mediation, and remonstrance being exploded by the insolent reply of Mr. Seward, the Emperor being anxious still to close the war as he has proved himself, and having paid to the Government of Washington every debt of justice and of courtesy, the question of recognising the insurgent may at any moment come before us as the question of attempting to obtain an armistice was urged upon the country in November. Were it not that for some weeks past Poland has engaged the world, before now it might have reached us. As things stand, it would find us in the worst condition to receive it, without conviction one way or the other in either party of the State by the avowal of their leaders. A fatal error might arise not from a mistaken but a hesitating judgment. It is at such a moment, if ever, that Parliamentary debate is useful and admissible; when of two opposite opinions on a question rapidly impending, neither can be said to prevail over the other, and no man on earth foresees by which our conduct will be guided. It is therefore to contribute to a practical result that I have given noble Lords the opportunity of speaking on America; and it could not have been done in any other form, because a Resolution or Address to pledge the action of the Government would have justly been resisted, and its withdrawal or defeat would prejudice the 8,000,000 men whose claims are now before you.

The opinion I am anxious to maintain is that the divergence of France and Great Britain on America ought not to go further, but to cease; and that when France invites us to acknowledge Southern independence, we should neither hold her back nor let her move alone, but on the contrary, act with her. And by acknowledgment, I mean the course of sending an Ambassador to the insurgent, or of receiving his Ambassador, or of engaging in a treaty with him, or of seeking exequaturs from him for the consuls in his territory. The first impression I should wish to combat very briefly is, that the acknowledgment by neutral States of Southern independence would have no practical effects and no important consequences. It seemed to be that of a noble Earl over the way, who lately held the Foreign seals, at the beginning of the Session. But if acknowledgment is wholly immaterial, why has the South continued to demand, and the North so long and pertinaciously endeavoured to avert it? Why are Southern Envoys now in London and in Paris, and why was the Government of Washington prepared at every cost but that of war to intercept them? Why have the Envoys, on arriving, made acknowledgment the simple object of their mission, and why has Mr. Seward sent to the different Powers a volume of despatches to resist it? It has reached me from credible authorities that last year the planters began to grow cotton when acknowledgment was looked for, and ploughed it in when the hope expired. It happened in this manner. The planters viewed acknowledgment as the road to peace, and were ready to invest their capital in the ordinary way when that road was likely to be opened. And it may well occur to them as having such a tendency. From the Northern mind it would take away the hope which lingers yet of Southern subjugation. From the Government of Washington it would take away the power of describing eleven communities contending for their liberty as rebels. The people of America are influenced by phrases, and will not come to terms with what they have been hounded on to look at as rebellion. But they can see a fact when Europe blazons it before them, and they may be awakened by her judgment to the nature of the foreign war on which their treasure and their happiness are wasted. When Europe has acknowledged it, the independence of the South may be debated in the Senate and the House, where no one now can venture to advert to it. A probable result of such a measure, if pursued by France, Great Britain, and other neutral States together, is, that it would weaken in the Executive at Washington its borrowing ability, because their loans are founded on the chances of re-conquest; and re-conquest would then appear what it is, a shadow and a dream. And it would do so with good reason. Victorious already, animated then, the Southern armies would be doubly irresistible. They would not have, if they retain it now, the power to be vanquished. Another practical effect of recognition—the belligerents might then endeavour to negotiate, which it is clear they cannot do at present. A separate result would be to put an end to all the idle views of reconstruction and of union which are floating in America, and which serve to prolong the war, because they disinculcate the North to the only basis upon which the close of it is possible. A yet more serious result the measure promises is freedom to the Government of Washington from the necessity of hopeless war which weighs on it at present. As soon as Europe sanctions its retreat, the greater portion of its evils are annihilated. As long as Europe sanctions its attempt, to renounce it is to suffer an indignity which never fell upon a State engaged in war with insurrection since modern history opened its varied scenes to our notice. Noble Lords who recollect how, after it had lasted forty years, the civil war between Spain and Holland was influenced in 1607-9 by the diplomacy of France and England, may be led to think in what form the present struggle might adjust itself. But they will also see that the efforts of the two Powers would have been as vain as they were brilliant and successful, unless Europe had before acknowledged the insurgent. I will not dwell upon the instance. It must engage the study of every Minister or Sovereign who aspires to the lofty task of closing the hostilities before us. And if I, wanting power to go on, should do nothing more than point to it to-night, the Motion might not be a useless one.

Lord Campbell

If noble Lords are not entirely satisfied as to the practical effects which recognition tends to, let me refer them to the despatch of Mr. Mason to the Secretary of State, dated August 1, in No. 2 of the papers lately given. He treats the point with that knowledge of the country, and the war itself, which must give weight to his expressions. The next doctrine, which stands in the way of the conclusion to which I am pointing, is even more important to consider, because in this House it received a kind of sanction on February 5 from the noble Earl who leads the Opposition, and who had the manliness to state that in espousing it he differed from the mass of his supporters. It has been laid down that you should recognise insurgent Powers only when you are going to give material assistance to their cause, or when the civil war is over;—that neutrals should reserve their voice until arms have fallen from the weak and fainting hands of the belligerents. Whether or not such ought to be the principle, it is not, as examples show, that on which the Powers of either world have generally acted. So far from the cessation of hostilities preceding the acknowledgment of neutrals, the acknowledgment of neutrals has, in nearly every case, preceded the cessation of hostilities. In combating this tenet, no doubt the cases of Belgium, under Lord Grey, Greece under the Duke of Wellington, Holland under Queen Elizabeth, ought to be excluded, because, in all three, material support and diplomatic intercourse were blended. But the United States acknowledged Nicaragua, under Walker, before hostilities had ceased to menace the existence of his Government. They acknowledged the South American Republics rising against Spain before the effort to reduce them was exhausted. When Colonel Mann was sent by the Government of Washington to Hungary, in 1848-9, he was instructed to acknowledge the seceding kingdom, not when hostilities had ceased, but when its independence could be counted on; and he reserved the voice he was invested with, not because he was controlled by the presence of Austrian troops, but by the chances—and he reasoned well—of the insurgents being reconquered. He did not find a settled, but a migratory Government, which fled from post to post, instead of meeting the invaders at its capital. But if we pass to Europe, France acknowledged the United States revolting against England before Lord North renounced his efforts to subdue them. It is idle to assert that Lord North engaged in war on such a provocation. All who read the memorandum drawn up by Mr. Gibbon for the Government, and do not fancy themselves better versed than him in the opinions of the statesmen who instructed him, know that Lord North began war with France on a different provocation. And what if he did not? Is Lord North, after he had marred his reputation by a civil war which all the men who formed the glory of that epoch denounced as wicked and demented, to be held up as a master of public law, and an oracle on international proceedings? Is the Minister of the day, no matter what may be his character, or what may be his errors, virtute officii an heir to the authority of Bynkershoek or Grotius? So much for France. Great Britain was tardy in acknowledging the South American republics. But that tardiness was reprobated by a brilliant and enlightened Opposition, of which the noble Lord the Secretary of State was not an inconsiderable ornament. And that tardiness was partially imposed by a generous regard for Spain, invaded as she was in 1823. It was justified, moreover, by the hazard of breaking with the great allies with whom, long after 1815, we had been acting, to whom, in 1823, France had become subservient, and who viewed the cause of the South American republies with aversion. My noble Friend the President of the Council, well versed in the career of Mr. Canning, at that time the Foreign Secretary, cannot have forgotten, that in that particular transaction to acknowledge the insurgents was to brave the greater portion of the world; that the despotic Powers made it almost a personal affair; that neither public law nor abstract rules, but special facts, and policy and prudence, at once delayed and fixed the hour of acknowledgment. The next and last example I shall give will make me independent of the others I have mentioned. It surpasses all the rest in magnitude and clearness; it tallies with the question now before the world in nearly every point, and it is one in which not a single State but Europe may be said herself to have delivered—and that in times far more monarchical, and therefore more averse to revolution than our own—a judgment on the question of acknowledgment. Great Britain, France, Sweden, Holland, all formed treaties with Portugal, seceding from the rule of Spain in 1641, a year after the Duke and Duchess of Braganza had proclaimed its independence, a quarter of a century before the Crown of Spain resolved to acquiesce in it. At that time Prussia had not come into existence as a State. Russia had not begun to mingle in the politics of Europe. Austria was attached to Spain by ties of family, and therefore the four recognising States may be fairly said to have composed a general tribunal of the Continent. So far from having ceased, the Spanish effort to reconquer by intrigue, conspiracies, and arms went on till after 1665, with a variety of fortune. The Duchess of Braganza, who became Regent, and on whose fortitude and judgment the success of the insurgents hung—as indeed her spirit and ascendancy had been the mainspring of the enterprise—employed the celebrated Schomberg as a general. Don John of Austria led the Spanish armies against Portugal. The battle of Villa Vicosa took away at last the hopes of the invaders. The war lingered on. In 1668, Spain and Portugal negotiated peace with one another. Was Europe acting then, in 1641, against the principles which ought to have directed her? Is there anything in Grotius, Bynkershoek, Vattel, Von Martens, Wheaton, to condemn her? It was an obvious duty upon my part to examine all these writers on the question of acknowledgment. But it is not a duty to inflict quotations on your Lordships. The references are with me here, and they will be at the command of any Member who desires them. A shorter method will enable me to show that the authorities agree in holding the power to maintain its independence—not the close of efforts to subdue it—to be the condition upon which a neutral may acknowledge an insurgent. Sir James Mackintosh, in a celebrated speech of 1824 upon the South American Republics, insists with glowing approbation on the case of Portugal, which I have brought under the notice of your Lordships. He does not question, but applauds the conduct of the recognising Powers. He does not hold it up to be avoided as an error, but, on the contrary, to be regarded as a brilliant lesson in his day. And your Lordships well know that Sir James Mackintosh was the disciple, the exponent, the successor, and the equal of the great men who have moulded public law into a science. You well know that what he sanctions they have sanctioned, and that when he unreservedly subscribes to what Europe did in 1641, Europe must have acted on their principle. What is it? The principle appears to be that the hazard of re-conquest is the only bar to acknowledgment when such a measure is likely to accelerate a peace and benefit the country which extends it. Should the insurgents yield after the acknowledgment of neutrals, their judgment is rebuked, their action vain, and they have given useless umbrage to the Power ultimately dominant. But it is not correct, according to the law of nations and the history of the world, to aver that the struggle must be over; the last army routed; the last shilling spent; the last drop of blood exhausted by the combatants. And it is not consistent with humanity. The vocation of acknowledgment is rather to preserve than to destroy, and by diplomacy to give a quicker passage to the end, which the long and sanguinary road of arms would ultimately point to. When you cannot advise the older State to persevere, when you denounce its efforts, and when you prophesy its failure; and when you cannot recommend the younger State to yield, what can be more irrational or cruel than to prolong hostilities between them? But by the reservation of acknowledgment you do prolong hostilities between them. The effort to reconquer has never been renounced, and scarcely ever been suspended, until neutrals had acknowledged the insurgent, from the civil war between Switzerland and Austria in the Middle Ages down to that which stagnates at this moment. And such a general result is what the plainest reason would have led us to anticipate. While neutrals countenance his hopes, is the invading Power likely to recede from them? Can he proclaim, without suggestion, his defeat? Can he embrace, without authority, his own humiliation? Can he assure bystanders he has sunk, while they by silence loudly tell him he may rally? It is not therefore easy to defend the conduct of a neutral who indirectly calls out for battles, and imposes expeditions, with a foregone conclusion that they must be useless for their purpose. But it is said, may you acknowledge an insurgent destined to succeed, while hostile armies are encamped in portions of his territory? My Lords, if you may not, you should withdraw your representatives from any country which becomes the seat of war. We ought, at least, to have withdrawn our minister from Spain in 1823, when France, unfortunately, marched without resistance on its capital. In accordance, therefore, with experience, authorities, and reason, I submit to this House—you may acknowledge the insurgent as soon as no doubt remains upon the issue of the struggle.

Lord Campbell

And is the issue doubtful? The capitalists of London, Frankfurt, Paris, Amsterdam, are not of that opinion. Within the last few days the Southern loan has reached the highest place in our market. £3,000,000 were required, £9,000,000 were subscribed for. The loan is based upon the security of cotton; and it has been well known for a twelvemonth that as far as the invaders march, that security must perish. But what is the opinion of military men upon the issue? The Emperor of the French, having been brought up as a soldier—having given a long life to military science, and having recently commanded the greatest armies of the day at Solferino and Magenta—in the despatch of November last did not conceal from the Government of Washington that subjugation was impossible. The Princes of the House of Orleans, who served with General McClellan, are thought to have inspired the excellent account of the campaign which appeared on October 15 in the Revue des Deux Mondes, and which has also tended to disperse the vision of re-conquest. To the same scale of judgment General Scott appears, by recent revelations, to contribute. And this, too, is remarkable. Not one military person in the North is known to view re-conquest as attainable. Neither General McClellan, Burnside, Rosecranz, McDowell, Halleck, or Buell, have ever publicly declared, so far as it has reached us, that the object of the Government they serve under is feasible. The ignominious task of prophesying triumph has been wisely left to the voluminous despatch writer, who, whatever his accomplishments, or merits, is no more qualified to judge the issue of campaigns than he is to guide the movements of battalions. But, after all, it may be granted in the abstract, that re-conquest is attainable. To genius nothing is denied. The only question it becomes the neutral Powers to consider is, can it be attained by Mr. Lincoln and his colleagues? It is by Mr. Lincoln and his colleagues, if at all, the South is to be conquered. There is not any person in their armies, such as Britain proudly watched in the Peninsula, able to control a Government behind, and overwhelm an enemy in front of him. If there was, they would recall him. It is therefore necessary to inquire what proof of its ability has this aggressive Cabinet developed. Is it in its choice of expeditions or of viceroys? Is it in appointing, superseding, or replacing the commanders it must lean on? Is it in their firm adherence to a principle? At one time they were opposed to the invasion they have plunged into. Is it in their conduct about slavery? At one time they boasted of their disposition to maintain it. Soon after, they desired the Border States to be delivered from it. After that emancipation was declared, but only in the States which were resisting them. The loyal region might preserve the institution—but seceders must renounce it. It ought to flourish where they reign—but not to stand beyond the limits of their sovereignty. But next, a bankrupt treasury would buy it by an outlay equal to the public debt of our country. But, after all, a servile war was indispensable, and so were armies to enforce it. A servile war, however, was proclaimed. The proclamation cannot be considered as unprecedented. The model was before them. Lord of Nature, as he deemed himself, Xerxes ordered lashes to be given to the waves. Swelling with omnipotence, Mr. Lincoln and his colleagues dictate insurrection to the slaves of Alabama. Are these the movements of a Government by which the broken fragments of the Union can be welded, a mighty Continent subdued, 8,000,000 free men braced into a unit, robbed of home, of honour, and of liberty? But who are they arrayed against? The House ought not, indeed, to join in the encomiums on the Southern President, which heat and sympathy have prompted. As no one was deemed happy by the ancients until his life had closed, no one will be stamped as great by us until his enterprise has triumphed. But so much may be hazarded of this extraordinary person that, gifted amply by nature, he has made the union of political and military excellence his object; and that, as far as Europe has observed, in the midst of danger and of care such as few men have the power to imagine, fewer to sustain, he has exhibited the patience and the enterprise, the ardour and the coolness, the heroism and urbanity, from which it generally happens that nations draw their birth and civil wars accept their destination. And this is most important to remember. If we look back to such conjunctures we do not find an instance in which mind, character, capacity have yielded to the want of all, no matter how well sustained the latter as regards forces, numbers, and revenue. The Roman Commonwealth, in spite of territory, population, armies, and resources, was destroyed from wanting any mind by which the mind of Cæsar could be balanced and encountered. Holland was lost to Spain when the Prince of Orange and Prince Maurice were superior to all the viceroys and the captains the mother country could oppose to them. Her South American dependencies were gone when she had no opponent of Bolivar. Your Lordships do not want to go back to the enlightened page of Davila or Sully to remind you that the civil wars of France, after ever kind of knot and of vicissitude, all closed in the pre-eminence of Henry IV.; in head and heart the master of his epoch. The Carlists had not any match for Espartero. The Sardinians had not any equal of Radetzky. The same lesson is impressed on us by the unfortunate collision of Washington and George III., of Charles I. and Cromwell. It is true, indeed, that history need not repeat itself, and that events are neither bound by theories or precedents. But such experience at least may forcibly suggest to us, that had Southern subjugation belonged to the decrees of fate, an instrument more powerful than that of Mr. Lincoln and his colleagues would be seen conducting to the sentence. It is not going beyond the bounds of caution to allege that a new chapter will be opened in the annals of mankind, if on this unrivalled scene the qualities which they regard with scorn are found triumphant over those which they agree to follow and to reverence. But, last of all, if Mr. Lincoln and his colleagues could succeed against the leader and the armies which oppose them, could they succeed against their own consciousness—revealed to us by many signs—of incapacity to do so?

Lord Campbell

If noble Lords agree, therefore, with the financial world, with military men, and with the Government of Washington itself, that the issue is not doubtful, and if therefore Great Britain has the right to acknowledge Southern independence, why ought she to exercise it? The first answer is:—Because honour calls on her to do so, and it rests on a detail which may be rapidly presented to your Lordships. British Consuls have remained during the war at Mobile, Charleston, and Savannah. They are there for the protection of our subjects, who reside by thousands on the seaboard. In times like these their presence is essential. Were it not for Consuls to identify them, the severe enlistment laws of the Confederacy might at any time descend on our people; or in the sudden turns of war their goods might be destroyed without a clue to ownership or means of compensation. They are also there to witness the blockade, and to report upon its efficacy. And these Consuls draw their exequaturs from the Government of Washington. They are a standing derogation to the Power which receives, which shelters, and endures them. We are not inclined to withdraw them. We ought, therefore, to accredit them to the insurgent who permits them to reside. And if we do, he is acknowledged. Honour forbids nations, as it does men, to run up a score of gratitude themselves, and to create a score of just resentment, in its object; to offer insult at the moment they are profiting by favour. In one sense alone do the Confederacy gain by the arrangement. We give them all the grandeur of forbearance. They allow our Consuls to reside, and we withhold the recognition which public law entitles them to ask of us. But is not our aspect, with regard to them, a poor one? We deny their rights over their territory, and yet at their hands receive the safety of our citizens. The Southern Congress is about to entertain the question of any longer tolerating our Consuls in this attitude. And what will be the situation of Great Britain if led by-and-by to do by interest and by convenience, what self-respect, and pride and justice dictate at this moment.

The neutrality we vaunt is the next consideration, which, if fairly viewed, would lead Great Britain to the course I have adverted to. The noble Lord the Secretary of State, in his despatch to Mr. Mason, dated August 2, has pointed out that the great controversy on the right to secede, so long and frequently debated in America, cannot be resolved by foreign Governments. It is not for them to decide between the arguments of Webster and Colhoun. They ought rather to reserve their judgment, considering the balance of the argument and the intricacy of the circumstances, than to pronounce in favour of secession or against it. But by withholding recognition when the issue no longer seems to be a doubtful one, when the danger of re-conquest is not the restraining fact, Great Britain does pronounce against the title to secede, does stamp the Southern movement as illegal, does therefore part with the neutrality which orders silence on that question. On what other ground is she refusing to acknowledge? And let your Lordships mark that by acknowledgment you do not for a moment stamp with your authority the claims of the insurgent—you give no verdict in his favour. If you did, the history of the world would have to be re-written. If you did, this country would never have been able to acknowledge the Revolutionary Government of France in February, 1848, which derived its short-lived power from neither throne, nor law, nor parliament, nor people—flung up by the delirium of Paris to sink at once with its repose, and no more to be regarded as the legal rulers of the country than the men in livery who cross the stage to take away the furniture between two acts of an eventful drama which absorbs us can be mistaken for the heroes of the scene or owners of the theatre. Acknowledgment is not a tribute, therefore, to the rights of the insurgents. But when the hazard of re-conquest is dismissed, it is a tribute to the rights of the invader—to withhold it. We are now declaring on the question of a title to secede on which the noble Lord himself, on which neutrality forbids us to be umpires. But even if it did not, the Confederacy, as Mr. Davis in his recent message has perspicuously explained, have suffered wrongs—although not meant to injure—from Great Britain. Our Government—however conscientiously—held back the Emperor of the French from a proposal which might have eminently served them. With the best intentions and designs they refused to allow the despatch of Mr. Mason on acknowledgment in August, for over six months, to reach the eye and judgment of the country. By denying our harbours to both sides when both might have had access to them—no doubt from a laudable desire of tranquillity—it has compelled the Southerners to burn their prizes on the waters, has thus destroyed their chance of raising privateers, and vastly limited their powers of self-defence against the country which invades them. After inducing the Confederacy, by a transaction which I described a year ago, to pledge itself to the observance of certain rules laid down at Paris in 1856, the British Government has not been ready to maintain them in the vital point that blockades must be effective to be binding. But illustrations of the kind may be dismissed. Partiality to the United States has been avowed in a despatch of March 27, 1862, from the noble Lord to Mr. Adams, and which the Government of Washington have brought before the world in page 62 of the volume they have recently distributed. In resisting the extortionate demands which Mr. Adams had addressed to him, and which, indeed, he manfully exposes, the noble Lord, as a set-off to his austerity, declares that allowance has been made for the difficulties which the United States had to contend with in the war; and that public law has been liberally interpreted in their favour. The book is here if noble Lords desire to refer to it. Allowance has been made for the difficulties of the United States in a war which both humanity and policy forbid, and which their own aggressive faithlessness created. Public law has been interpreted, and liberally, in favour of a Government which supports the infamous M'Neil, lays waste the houses of distinguished adversaries in Virginia; which ruins havens in Savannah and in Charleston; which is ready to let loose 4,000,000 negroes on their compulsory owners; and to renew from sea to sea the horrors and the crimes of St. Domingo. But let it be so. I did not come here to impugn the decisions of the noble Lord. He is not called upon to vindicate them.

I mention these unfavourable actions to the South, without a view to censure of the Government. The only inference I draw is, that if neutrality directs us, they require an instant course of reparation and of balance. Acknowledgment is the only form in which Great Britain can propose, or in which the injured Power is willing to accept it.

But I will not build up an argument, sufficient as it stands, and go on to the next consideration, which demands (and loudly) such a measure. It is our own security in Canada. A noble Earl who gained his laurels in the East, well pointed out to us last Session, that whenever the war closed Canada would be endangered. If victorious, the Northern States might attack it in the drunkenness of pride; if defeated, in the bitterness of failure. Some men, out of doors have been so infatuated as to hold that by carefully abstaining from anything which gives umbrage to the United States, we should defend it. As if aggressive Powers had ever been restrained, by wanting pretexts, from the wars they were inclined to. The security of Canada is quickly seen by your Lordships to reside in one circumstance alone—the danger of attacking it. That danger will at least be greater when the Southern Power is friendly to Great Britain than when it is estranged, inasmuch as the aggressive State will then have to contemplate the chance of an attack upon his rear as well as the bombardment of his cities and destruction of his commerce. No doubt, Canada is safe while the civil war continues; but we are neither able nor entitled to prolong it for her safety. The civil war may close after the acknowledgment of Southern independence by the Emperor, although Great Britain has not shared that manifesto. We may not be able much longer to keep back the virtue and humanity, as well as all the interests, the fears, and wants which tend to force the measure upon Europe. From the moment separation was inevitable, no statesman could be blind to our want of an ally on the other side of the Atlantic. The United States can never possibly become one, not only because they are embittered, or because our interests are clashing, or because our institutions are repugnant, or because a rivalry is forced upon us in manufactures, and in ships, but because no alliance has ever yet occurred between the mother country and the Power who had violently broken from it. The friendly disposition of the South is therefore necessary to us. It is attainable. And if we wantonly forego it, if we allow the war to close before we have acknowledged, both the separated Powers being irrevocably hostile to us, we may be forced, now to guard Canada from one, now the West Indies from the other. Our diplomatists, moreover, would have no influence or voice in the Confederacy, whether they attempted to soften the resentments which the war had left behind it, to gain legitimate advantages in trade, to deprecate aggressive views, or to improve the situation of the negro. But on this point noble Lords who have been our representatives abroad have the materials of thinking far more strongly than myself in the direction I have pointed to.

Lord Campbell

Dismissing policy, I need touch but briefly on the moral obligation to acknowledge, because, on grounds already stated, it applies generally to the case of neutrals and insurgents, when the hazard of re-conquest is exhausted. It arises from the circumstance adverted to before, that in the civil wars of Europe, since the time of Charles V. (and to these may be added that of the Swiss cantons and the House of Austria in the middle ages), the acknowledgment of neutrals has preceded the conclusion of hostilities; and while that preface is withheld, that close is not to be anticipated. It is only requisite to glance at the special circumstances which enhance an abstract duty as regards Great Britain and the war which is before us. The first and most striking is the Lancashire distress, which is not likely to pass off until cotton falls in price, and rises in abundance. And that can hardly be expected to occur until the war is over. No man, conversant with political economy, supposes that cotton crops will start into existence in other portions of the world, while an avalanche of 4,000,000 bales impends upon the market from America. But that it does so, our Consuls in the South, Mr. Bunch and Mr. Molyneux, have recently informed us in public letters, known to all the trading world. The impression that the price will be depressed during the existence of the war is strengthened by what has fallen from Mr. Bazley, Mr. Bright, Mr. Mangles, and Mr. Laing, the highest practical authorities, who have all addressed the public on the topic. Another special circumstance is, that the present war—waged between descendants of Great Britain—appears to be unequalled in the records of the annalist, or the conceptions of the poet, for the masses exposed to death, the area through which the carnage is extended, the amount of families divided and bereaved, the bitter and relentless passions which exasperate the combatants. Beyond this, the Government of Washington are more incapable of making peace spontaneously than any other which has ever grappled with insurgents, considering the pledges they have made, the debts they have incurred, the hosts they have annihilated. As well might you require a man to perform a useful amputation on himself against the influence of others, as expect that Mr. Lincoln and his colleagues can terminate the war against the South, whilst Europe still excludes it from the family of nations. The duty to give the strife a possibility of closing, is immensely heightened by the fact that they appear to be pursuing it in the midst of well-founded despair, and under a necessity which only neutrals can annihilate. That they are doing so will appear to those who watch the tone of Mr. Greeley in The New York Tribune, who observe the desperate expedient of enlisting negro regiments, and who reflect that West Virginia would be useless as a State unless the two belligerents were separated. But let any one recall the past, and reason for a moment on this question. Would Mr. Lincoln and his colleagues have embarked upon the war had they foreseen the tenor of its history? If, on the eve of crossing the Potomac, a higher Power had revealed to them the panorama of disaster and disgrace which they were doomed to bring upon their country; the panic of Bull Run; the scared and broken columns falling into Washington; the long and dreary autumn of paralysis which followed; the victories which took away the hope of any Southern party for the Union, and which as loudly as defeats proclaimed the madness of their enterprise; the cotton blazing on the Mississippi as they reached it; the capture of New Orleans without a practical result beyond the indignation of the world at the revolting tyranny which held it; had they caught a glimpse of the engagements which drove General M'Clellan to his gunboats—the scions of a Royal house partaking his confusion—and seen the tide of war rolled back upon their territory, and then another host sent out to dissolve itself, to put an end to the anxiety of Richmond, and to perform the tragedy of Fredericksburg; and, last of all, had they been able to forecast, with eighteen vessels hot in their pursuit, the Southern cruisers roaming on the sea triumphant and implacable;—would they have been deaf to the commissioners in the spring of 1861? would they have scorned a peace? would they have sent their expedition to Fort Sumter? would they have trampled on the law to plunge into hostilities? They are they not reluctantly pursuing them without a choice, till neutrals have acknowledged the insurgent? Shall Europe any longer chain them to the effort? Or, rather, when the Emperor desires to release, ought we to keep them inert and helpless victims on the lake of fire their blunders have created?

My Lords, these grand considerations of honour, of neutrality, of policy, and duty, would lead the people of the country to require an acknowledgment of Southern independence, were it not for the delusions as to slavery, which for a month or two have been promoted, and which, unless I am enabled to confront, I should seem, perhaps, to have avoided. To confront is to expose them. And the shortest method which occurs to me, is at once to drive these puny agitators to an issue. They have deceived the working classes of the country by confounding questions about slavery, which ought not to be discussed, with the only one which it behoves the British public to consider. We may go on eternally debating whether the desire to extend and to preserve it was at the bottom of secession; whether the desire to abridge or to eradicate it was at the bottom of invasion. These points, involving the recesses of the human heart, are little known even in America. History may discuss: Omniscience only can determine them. And it is idle mockery to force them on a mass of operatives, divided by 3,000 miles from any clue to the inquiry. The legitimate, the only issue is (and they will not venture to deny it), whether separation or reconquest will be most conducive to the welfare of the negro; the prosperity of Africa, and the attainment of the objects which have long engaged the Buxtons, and the Wilberforces, and other admirable men who scorn to be connected with this diminutive machinery for prolonging war on one side of the ocean, by spreading fiction on the other. We should therefore trace, and it is quickly done, the natural results of the alternatives. In the event of separation, there will no longer be the possibility of extending negro bondage into territories in which it does not now exist. Already it is settled in New Mexico. And no boundary you can well conceive will give the Southern States uncultivated land beyond that Northern limit. In the event of separation, the North will not return the negro fugitives who cross over its border. And the planter must retain them, not by law and terror, but by judgment and humanity. There will be a premium on benevolence, a penalty on inattention and injustice, which has not heretofore existed. Slaves will be contented, or escape. Under the Union they found a prison in a continent. In the event of separation, the whole question of black labour may be impartially considered by the Southerners. Whereas, during the last decade the violence of the Northern Abolitionists had fixed the system, had inflamed into a point of honour, or a passion, the opinion against which they were crusaders. In what manner would re-conquest operate upon the negro? A servile war would be its melancholy preface, in which murder confronts the slave and rapine the proprietor. In such a conflict, many blacks must be exterminated, and nearly all the higher classes driven from the country. The dismantled houses and the confiscated fields become the property of Northerners. The conquerors at once discover that the soil is worthless unless the labour of the black may be applied to it. The negroes who survive, demoralized and scattered, will not be all of them recaptured; and if they were, would be inadequate in number to the purpose. How are the new proprietors, desiring wealth and jealous of sterility, to find the labour which is wanting to them? Africa is open. Africa contains the millions they are seeking. The flag of the United States before now has unfortunately been a shelter to the slave trade. The want of the United States may prove its resurrection in America. And this, too, is unanswerable. During the last few years, while the Union went on undivided, the efforts of Great Britain on the subject were defeated. As soon as ever the civil war divided it, the Government of Washington conceded the right of search; while their organs insolently told us that it would be withdrawn as soon as Southern subjugation was accomplished. After this, what man can be so mad as to declare that the friends of Africa and of her race ought to concur with the invaders and advance pleas in their behalf, which they themselves have not the forehead to resort to?

Lord Campbell

The only further sentiment which in the event of other neutrals being prepared might indispose the country to acknowledgment is a lingering idea that the cause of freedom is involved in the retention of the Union. It is just therefore to inquire for whose advantage it would come again into existence. We have seen it would not be for that of Africa or of the negro. It could not be for that of the seceders, as the miseries of New Orleans have explained, where that rule has been established, and those terrors have been felt, which would then apply to all the cities of their territory. Who says they ought not to perish rather than submit to a yoke more bitter and degrading than was ever known yet in Warsaw or in Venice? But language shrinks from such a topic. Then, would it be restored for the advantage of the North? At least they can only gain their object, if it is attainable, through the medium of a general who, when he had attained it, must rank among the highest conquerors — with Cæsar, Charlemagne, Napoleon. Would such a character be likely to resign his arms to Mr. Lincoln and his colleagues? What temptation could he have to conduct so derogatory and to sacrifice so thankless? It was thought by many that General McClellan at the time of his dismissal might have turned his regiments on the capital with safety. And there were not wanting those who loudly censured his forbearance. In this war there has been no fact more pregnant and instructive than the disposition, in spite of his reverses, to exalt him. For many months a halo has surrounded his inaction. Would the army then refuse to follow one who had performed marvels instead of shrinking before obstacles; who had given them the plunder of the south instead of leading them through hardships and privations to their starting-point; who had won affection, not by his designs and his retreats, but by his actions and his progress; whose title rested on the fact, not that Baltimore was safe, but that Montgomery had fallen. A tide of arguments would rush into the mind of such a general, to dissuade him from surrendering his power to institutions so discredited, so trampled on, and so remote from those which Washington bequeathed, as he would find subsisting in his country! But the impulse from within would be exceeded by the pressure from without. In a sickened and disorganised society which only pants for rule, he would not choose but be coerced into the part of a dictator. And is it for a despotism that the people of the North are pouring out their blood, and tarnishing their glory? Already it exists. It had its birth in war, and it would take its immortality from conquest. Then, would the Union be restored for the advantage of the world? What country would be safer? Would Brazil? What country would be freer? Would Poland gain when the only patron of the Czar recovered his original dimensions? At first, indeed—for facts will ever guide the calculation of your Lordships—the necessity of Southern garrisons might tend to keep them in repose. But in a few years—they do not labour to conceal it from us—a power more rapacious, more unprincipled, more arrogant, more selfish and encroaching, would arise than has ever yet increased the outlay, multiplied the fears, and compromised the general tranquillity of Europe. And on this overgrown, on this portentous form of tyranny and egotism, many countries would depend for the material of that important industry which languishes at present.

My Lords, the latter point might be explained by statistics I have with me. But it will hardly be impugned, and it is more important to remind you that not much more than five years have elapsed since France and Great Britain were united to withstand a Power which overshadowed and assailed the general security of nations. To gain their object it was requisite to interrupt a peace of forty years, and squander noble lives upon the trenches and the battle-field. In order now to reach equivalent results and parallel advantages, they are required not to lavish, but to save; not to arm battalions, but to disperse them; not to open conflict in the world, but snatch an hemisphere from misery. What in Russia wanted toil, outlay, unmeasured risks, and endless combinations, for aught we know may be accomplished by a fiat in America. And the presence of a noble Duke on the bench (the Duke of Newcastle) might have suggested to me, that there are some inherent evils in the partnership of arms which have not any place in the alliances of diplomacy. The initiative will belong to France. But if it did not, should Great Britain be ashamed of it? Whoever contemplates habitually her place or aspect on the globe, will sometimes think that it imposes a double task on her career to urge on civilization from its Eastern cradle to its Western home, and also as the firm and watching outpost of the sea, to stand between the older Powers and the evils which the other side of the Atlantic may occasionally threaten. Long has she fulfilled the first, and nobly may she now sustain the second part of the vocation which belongs to her. And if it suits the dignity of empire to compass large results by trifling exertions—instead of wasting giant means upon invisible achievements—the day will be a proud one, when in a voice which Europe has re-echoed her message rolls over the waters to guard the freedom of the Old World, and limit, if not arrest, the sorrows of the New. But whether we resolve to lead or hesitate to follow, whether we retard, or join, or suffer isolation from the continent, I shall be indebted to your Lordships for permitting me to show to-night, that the neutral Powers have at once the right and duty to acknowledge the Confederacy, and that according to the only lights their rulers are possessed of until that measure is adopted, the war can never end.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, I suppose there is no Member of either House of Parliament who does not wish for the termination of the civil war in America. It disturbs commerce, it puts to hazard the peace of the world, and it afflicts America herself; and if anything could be usefully, and, I must add, justly done to bring that war to a termination, I repeat there is no Member of either House of Parliament, and no person in the country, who would not gladly see such a consummation. But, after having listened to my noble Friend, I must confess I remain in the same persuasion as before at the present moment—and I speak only of the present moment—that there is nothing this country could do usefully and wisely which would tend to the termination of the hostilities on the other side of the Atlantic. My noble Friend has somewhat mixed different topics, and he has alluded to three different modes of intervention of States in the affairs of other countries. One—which is the minimum of interference—that of advice, good offices, and mediation; another, the mode proposed by my noble Friend to-night, that of recognition; and the third, one which we have sometimes resorted to, and which other nations have more frequently had recourse to—that of forcible intervention. My noble Friend says, and says truly, that since I had the honour of addressing the House last summer there has been some divergence between the views on this subject of the Government of this country and that of the Emperor of the French. The Government of the Emperor of the French conceives that it might tend to the termination of the war if three Powers—France, Great Britain, and Russia—were to propose a suspension of hostilities with a view of negotiation between the two belligerents. Her Majesty's Government, after carefully examining that proposition, came to the conclusion that its adoption by us would not be likely to lead to its acceptance by the Government of the United States of America; while, if that should be the case, by causing irritation, it would not increase but diminish the chances of our seeing a termination of the contest. The French Government has since proceeded in accordance with its views, and has actually proposed to the Government of the United States to negotiate with the Southern States. That proposition has not been adopted; and I think your Lordships will judge from what has happened with reference to the proposals of France, and with reference to suggestions thrown out in other countries, that this policy of good offices and mediation is not, at the present moment, likely to tend to promote peace, but rather to provoke measures of opposition; and thus the reproach would be cast upon this country that we had aggravated the evils of the present lamentable state of affairs in America. It does not appear, at the present moment, that this contest would be likely to be terminated by an offer of our good offices. I say at the present moment, because it is impossible to say that in the course of events a time may not come when both the contending parties would be desirous of the good offices or wise counsels of friendly Powers. I do not see any probability of that at this moment, but I wish to guard myself against being supposed to speak positively of the future. We come, then, to the course proposed by my noble Friend—namely, that of recognition. My noble Friend alluded to several cases—not very happy illustrations of his argument, I think—in which the United States of America have recognised insurgent countries which they believed likely to be able to maintain their independence. One was the revolted State of Hungary, whose independence had ceased to appear—it had sunk like the island in the Mediterranean—had disappeared before the despatch reached Vienna by which the United States recognised it. Another instance referred to by my noble Friend scarcely comes within the category of recognition, though it has been quoted by a gentleman who has written some very able letters under the title of "Historicus,"—I mean the recognition of the United States themselves by France, two years after the war with this country, in 1772, had begun. If any one will examine that precedent, and the important documents which have lately come to light, he will see that the French monarchy of the day had for some years—most unfortunately for itself—been exciting democratic passions in America, and had been endeavouring to raise opposition there to the Government of Great Britain. It had prepared means of concert with these States; and even in the letter, so courteous in appearance, but so exceedingly hostile and bitter in its spirit, written by the French Ambassador at the Court of St. James's, it was stated that the French Government had not only made a treaty of commerce with the United States, which they had already recognised, but further, that they had a right to carry that treaty into effect, if necessary, even by force. This was a threat to take part in the war between Great Britain and her revolted colonies. But we know, that besides this open threat, there was a secret treaty signed, by which France pledged herself to lend her support to the revolted provinces; and the Government and the Opposition of this country, which was then as decided as ever any Opposition was, agreed that the threat was one of war, and that by war only could it be met. This, therefore, was not a case of recognition, but a case of interference. It was, I think, a most unjustifiable interference—an interference for the purpose of spreading those democratic principles, which afterwards reacted on France, and produced so many excesses and crimes during the Revolution. Well, then, with regard to the other cases to which my noble Friend has alluded, those of Portugal and Holland were cases of forcible intervention. There is hardly more than one case in which the question was limited to simple recognition—that was the war carried on between Spain and her revolted colonies, which went on from 1808 to 1822 or 1823 without any proposal for a recognition. This case is one worthy of the attention of your Lordships, because it was illustrated by the mild wisdom of Lord Lansdowne, by the profound research of Sir James Mackintosh, and by the dazzling genius of Canning. We have therefore, upon this question of recognition, as much light as can possibly be thrown upon any subject. Now, I beg to refer your Lordships to the words of Lord Lansdowne. He was zealous for the recognition of the South American Provinces; he thought it would be a great advantage to this country to recognise them, and he was entirely free from any trammels of office, or any obligation to consult the interests of the Minister of the day. But, with that wisdom and forbearance which characterized every act of his public life, he stated, "The first point to consider is whether you have the right;" and he went on thus—

Earl Russell

"It will be my duty this night to point out to your Lordships the great advantages which may result from the establishment of South American independence. I hope I shall never stand up in this House to recommend your Lordships to adopt any course of policy inconsistent with those principles of right which are paramount to all expediency, and which compose that great law of nations any departure from which, to answer a selfish and ambitious policy, never fails to recoil upon its authors." [2 Hansard, x. 973.]

These are words upon which this House may well reflect; and we may well consider upon what grounds Lord Lansdowne founded the views which I have just brought under the notice of your Lordships. In the first place, he stated it was necessary that a country which required to be recognised should have established its independence. In the next place, that it should be able to maintain that independence for the future. And lastly, that it should be able to carry on with all foreign nations those relations of peace and amity which form the general international law of the world. Now, examine the state of the revolted provinces of Spain at that time, as Sir James Mackintosh and Mr. Canning did. We find that the greater part of South America had been some twelve or fourteen years entirely free from the presence of Spanish armies. We find that with regard to those provinces in which that was not absolutely the case—namely, Mexico, where Vera Cruz alone was occupied by a Spanish garrison, and Peru, where there were 4,000 or 5,000 Spanish troops, although the cause of Spain seemed hopeless—it was agreed that their recognition should be deferred; and that only in the case of Buenos Ayres, and those parts of South America which had clearly and for a number of years established their independence, would it be right for Great Britain to proceed to the step of recognition. Besides this, Mr. Canning took care to inform the Spanish Minister that such recognition would not be very long delayed; that if the Spanish Government wished to recognise them, they ought to take that step, and that Great Britain was willing to give time before proceeding to recognise them herself. Well, here is a great precedent for our consideration—here is a step taken by the Government of the day after considerable care and examination; here is a course recommended by the Opposition of the day—not in any harsh spirit, but notwithstanding the conviction which this country generally entertained that the cause of Spain was hopeless, and that the independence of those provinces was firmly established. Well, now, if we look to the present position of North America, and compare it with that of the States of which Lord Lansdowne spoke, we find that the war in North America is still carried on with the utmost vigour—I had almost said with the utmost fury. We find some of those provinces which were the first to proclaim their independence—a great part of Louisiana, New Orleans, and the banks of the Mississippi, occupied by the Federal armies. There are very considerable Federal armies menacing cities of the Confederation, such as Charleston and Savannah. So that no man can say it is a case of hopeless war. For my own part, and speaking according to my limited vision, I do not believe those efforts of the Federals will be successful. No man can say that the North will subdue the South; but no man can say that the war is finally over, or that the independence of the Southern States is established. Well, then, what is the present state of the case? Although great efforts have been made in vain, the great Federal Republic seems unwilling to accept the decision of events. So far from it, we find the last acts of the Congress which has just expired are to place, by conscription, every man fit to carry arms at the disposal of the President of the United States, and to vote sums of money amounting to no less than £180,000,000 sterling for the purpose of carrying on the war. Then, in this state of affairs I should say, that looking to the question of right, it would not be a friendly act towards the United States, it would not be to fulfil our obligations to a country with which we have long maintained relations of peace and amity—a great country which says it can still carry on the war—it would, I say, be a failure of friendship on our part if at this moment we were to interpose and recognise the Southern States. I have endeavoured to guard myself by saying that I speak now with reference to the present aspect of affairs. I hardly know any moment in which my noble Friend could have brought forward his Motion with less encouragement from events. It may turn out that these immense efforts which are being made by the Federal Government shall be made in vain; that the spirit of the South is unconquerable as their determination never to be united again with the Northern States is final and irrevocable; and that a time may come when the duty of this country will be totally different from what it is at the present moment. All that may be the case—all I maintain is, that it is our duty at present to stand still and not to proceed to an act so definite, so positive—an act so unfriendly to the United States as the recognition of the South. My noble Friend spoke of various topics—of danger of Canada being attacked by the Northern Republic, and of the West Indies being attacked by the Southern. My Lords, I cannot follow my noble Friend into these suppositions. I do not venture to say what may be the future course of events. I confine myself to that which I think to be our duty now, which I think is right; and if that be so, we must be content in future days to meet with future dangers, and it will not enfeeble our arms if we have it in our power to reflect that we have never failed in our obligations to those which have been great States in peace and amity with us, and that it has not been through any fault of ours that a great affliction has fallen on them. Well, my Lords, I know not that there is anything in what my noble Friend has said to-night which would make it necessary for me to go much further into this question; but at the same time there were allusions in parts of his speech to former occasions and former instances of interference on our part, as if my noble Friend and some of those who looked forward to his Motion to-night expected that there should be some interference on our part in this war. Now, my Lords, I wish to say only a few words upon that which we have done in former days by way of intervention. We, too, like other States, though not so often as some, have at times taken upon us to intervene. We interfered in the case of

Earl Russell

Holland to save her from the religious tyranny and political despotism of Philip II. That contest was hallowed by the blood of Sir Philip Sydney, and by the part we took we contributed to her independence. In another case—the case of Portugal—we interfered. Charles I., Cromwell, and Charles II., all agreed in that interference. We declared ourselves ready to send 10,000 men to the aid of the new Government of Portugal, and we helped the Portuguese to relieve themselves from the Spanish tyranny under which they groaned, and to establish the independence of their State. In more recent times, when Greece endeavoured to establish her independence, we aided her in her contest with Turkey; we rescued her from the destruction which threatened her, and helped her to found a free and independent monarchy. Take the case of Belgium again. When the Belgians declared that they were unable to remain under the Government of Holland, in accordance with the Treaty of Vienna, we interfered by force, in conjunction with France; and the wise and happy arrangement was made by which the freedom of Belgium was secured. Now, my Lords, in all these instances, whether the intervention was carried on by our ancestors or in our own times, there is nothing of which an Englishman need be ashamed. If we have taken part in interventions, it has been in behalf of the independence, freedom, and welfare of a great portion of mankind. I should be sorry, indeed, if there should be any intervention on the part of this country which could bear another character. I trust that this will not be the case, and that no interests, deeply as they may affect us—interests which imply the well-being of a great portion of our people, but interests which may affect also the freedom and happiness of other parts of the globe—will induce us to set an example different from that of our ancestors; but that when we feel ourselves bound to interfere—and may it be seldom—it will be an interference in the cause of liberty and to promote the freedom of mankind, as we have hitherto done in these cases. It is with this conviction that I have addressed these few remarks as to what has been done by this country in former days; and I trust that with regard to this civil war in America we may be able to continue our impartial and neutral course. Depend upon it, my Lords, that if that war is to cease, it is far better it should cease by a conviction, both on the part of the North and the South, that they can never live again happily as one community and one republic, than that the termination of hostilities should be brought about by the advice, the mediation, or the interference of any European Power. I repeat, I have spoken only of the duty of the Government at the present time, and I trust that there will now be no further debate on this subject.

SALMON EXPORTATION BILL—[No. 51.]

REPORT.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

Clause 3 (Prohibition of Export of Salmon at certain Times).

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE moved to omit the words—

“No unclean or unseasonable Salmon and no Salmon caught during the Time at which the Sale thereof is prohibited in the District where it is caught, shall be exported or entered for Exportation from any Part of the United Kingdom to Parts beyond Seas,” for the purpose of inserting other words, the effect of which would be to prohibit the importation of salmon from abroad during the close season.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY opposed the Amendment.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY supported it.

On Question, Whether the words proposed to be omitted shall stand part of the Clause? their Lordships divided:—Contents 8; Not-Contents 6: Majority 2.

CONTENTS.

Newcastle, D.	Torrington, V.
Somerset, D.
	Foley, L. [Teller .]
Granville, E.	Harris, L.
St. Germans, E.	Stanley of Alderley, L.
	[Teller .]

NOT-CONTENTS.

Malmesbury, E.	Colville of Culross, L.
Powis, E.	[Teller .]
	Panmure, L. (E. Dal-
Everaley, V.	housie .) [Teller .]
	Redesdale, L.

RAILWAY THROUGH GREENWICH PARK.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT TORRINGTON called the attention of the House to the London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Bill (No. 1) and its proposed interference with the Greenwich Park and the Observatory at Greenwich; and asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether they have made a Report upon the Bill to the Board of Trade, and, if so, moved that such Report be laid on the table of the House.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, the Admiralty had written to the Board of Trade, forwarding a Report which had been received from the Astronomer Royal in reference to the Bill referred to by the noble Viscount. It was pointed out by the Astronomer Royal that the proposed course of the railway lay within 1,000 feet of the Observatory; that if its course passed above ground the concussion of the air thereby produced would be very injurious to any observations which might be taken; but that danger was, of course, much lessened by the fact that trains would pass through a tunnel at that point. At the distance of 1,000 feet he was not sure that it would do any harm at all. It was proposed that experiments should be made during the Easter recess near railroads already in existence, for the purpose of discovering what effect would be produced by the subterraneous passage of trains upon astronomical instruments placed within 1,000 feet; and having thus gained information with regard to the extent of the tremor of the earth, he should, if necessary, move an instruction to the Committee to whom the Bill would be referred after Easter. He should be sorry to interfere unnecessarily with a railway in which a large number of the inhabitants of Greenwich took a great interest; and, on the other hand, it was necessary to see that no damage resulted from works in connection with any private enterprise to an institution so valuable as Greenwich Observatory.

TRUSTEES (SCOTLAND) ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Brought from the Commons, and read 1st. (No. 53.)

ALKALI WORKS REGULATION BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for the Regulation of Alkali Works—Was presented by The Lord STANLEY of ALDERLEY, and read 1st. (No. 55.)

House adjourned at half past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, March 23, 1863.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES—considered in Committee; Resolutions (March 20) reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Vaccination (Ireland) [Bill 70], Debats adjourned.
Committee—Marine Mutiny; Telegraphs [Bill 57].
Consid. as amended—Tobacco Duties [Bill 66].
Third Reading—Mutiny; and passed.
Bill withdrawn—Education of Factory Children [Bill 28].

THE RIVER SHANNON.—QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, When Mr. Bateman's Report on the state of the River Shannon is to be laid before the House?

MR. PEEL said, in reply, that Mr. Bateman's Report upon the state of the Shannon had not yet been delivered, and that it was probable some time would elapse before it was ready. When it was sent in, it would, of course, be laid on the table.

SERJEANT MAJOR LILLEY, OF THE INNISKILLEN DRAGOONS.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN ARCHDALL said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the attention of the War Department or of his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, has been called to a recent Court Martial held on the Paymaster of the Inniskillen Dragoons, and to the remarks of the Commander-in-Chief in India on the proceedings of said Court Martial, and on the state of the Regiment; also to certain allegations which have been made in the public press and elsewhere as to the confinement in close arrest and death of Regimental Serjeant Major Lilley, of the above Regiment; whether any inquiry has taken place, and what has been the result of such inquiry? He would further beg to inquire whether the Secretary for War was in possession of any information respecting the remarks of Sir Hugh Rose, when in command, upon the discipline, efficiency, and soldier-like conduct of the Inniskillen Dragoons, and whether a statement has not been made to the effect that the death of Serjeant Major Lilley was attributable to an excess of ardent spirits rather than to the severity of his confinement?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS, in reply, said, the attention of his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief and of the War Department had been directed to the case in question. A full Report from India had been called for, and he understood it had lately been received at the Horse Guards. The matter was still under consideration, and no decision had been come to at present.

MR. SCARLETT AND THE GREEKS.

EXPLANATION.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE: Sir, I hope the House will allow me to express the regret with which I learn that my remarks the other evening were misunderstood by some of Mr. Scarlett's friends. So far from reflecting on his conduct, I may venture to say that, under great difficulties and with the most ambiguous instructions, no Minister could have acted with greater ability, judgment, and discretion; and, while I retract nothing from my criticisms on Lord Russell's policy, I am still happy to be able to add that it is the opinion of the Greek gentlemen with whom I have been in constant communication that Mr. Scarlett and Mr. Elliot, by their wise and prudent counsels, gave a great support to the admirable attitude of the Greek nation throughout these trying circumstances.

THE CAPITATION GRANT TO THE VOLUNTEER FORCE.—QUESTION.

CAPTAIN GRAY said, he wished to ask, Whether the conditions of the proposed Capitation Grant will be soon laid before the House?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the regulations under which the Capitation Grant to the Volunteers would be distributed were in a forward state, and would very shortly be laid before the House.

NEUTRAL RIGHTS.—QUESTION.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he would beg to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government, If Her Majesty's Government have accepted, or are prepared to accept the proposal stated by President Lincoln in his annual Message to have been made to them by his direction, and which he understood was made as far back as October last, respecting the establishment of a Convention between this country and the Government of the United States, in order to examine and adjust complaints of the violation of Neutral rights.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, communications have passed between the two Governments in relation to a Convention on this subject. Her Majesty's Government have no objection in principle to such an arrangement, but difficulties have arisen in regard to details. Those difficulties are not yet removed; but I am not without hopes that the two Governments may ultimately come to an understanding on the matter.

THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.—NOTICE.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER gave notice that he should submit his Financial Statement to the House on Thursday, the 16th of April, that being the second Government day after the recess, and it not being the usage to place any important business on the paper the first night after the re-assembling of Parliament. He also begged to give notice that in the event of the Report on the Tobacco Duties Bill being received that night without opposition, he should to-morrow move that it be read a third time at half past four, in order that it might at once be taken up to the House of Lords, so that the trade might be relieved from suspense as soon as possible.

ASSURANCES REGISTRATION (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 46.]—NOTICE.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he should not move the second reading of this Bill that evening.

MR. WHITESIDE: Does the hon. Baronet intend to bring on the Bill before Easter?

SIR ROBERT PEEL: No; after Easter I shall bring it on.

MR. WHITESIDE: After the Budget?

SIR ROBERT PEEL: No.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

POLAND—THE TREATY OF VIENNA.

QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he rose to ask a Question of the First Lord of the Treasury as to the nature of the obligations with respect to Poland involved in the Treaty of Vienna. It was now rather more than three weeks since the House had, in the course of debate, pronounced its opinion on the state of affairs in Poland. On that occasion certain general pledges were given by the noble Lord, as to the policy which the Government intended to pursue; and the House exercised considerable forbearance in not pressing the Government for immediate explanations on the subject. The time had now, however, come when they were entitled to ask the Government what they were doing. Since the debate on this question, events in Poland had made great progress. The intelligence of the recent defeat of General Langiewicz had been construed by the English press into a serious blow to the Polish cause; but he thought he could show that the event by no means deserved the importance which had been attributed to it. The area of the insurrection in Poland was now three times as extensive as it was when he had the honour of directing attention to the subject; and in estimating the defeat of General Langiewicz it was necessary to bear in mind the nature of his position. General Langiewicz had just crossed the Austrian frontier, and held command in the south-west corner of Poland, and at no time did his operations extend beyond an irregular circle of from forty to fifty miles radius, or a total area of some 1,600 square miles. From General Langiewicz's head-quarters, as straight as a bird could fly, to Bar, in the east of Poland, where the largest number of insurgents was assembled, was a distance of 500 miles. Kiew was 200 miles further to the east. Again, from Skala to Konin was 200 miles. From Bar to Pinsk, in the north, was 250 miles, and to Vilno 500 miles. Polotsk, on the frontier of Lithuania, was 600 miles to the east of Konin. The meaning of those figures was, that while the Polish general, commanding an area of less than 1,600 square miles, had suffered defeat, the insurrection itself, which reigned over about 50,000 square miles, had been extending its area day by day. If the gravity of the rising were to be estimated by the numbers that took part in it, the result would be no less striking. And with regard to Polish affairs generally, he would take the liberty of cautioning the House against placing too implicit reliance upon the details daily furnished by the telegrams of the numbers of Poles disarmed, captured, or slain. There was a remarkable coincidence in two telegraphic despatches which were published in the leading journal of that day. One was dated Warsaw, March 20, and stated that Sokol, the Polish general in the north, was attacked by the Russians and defeated, with the loss of 400 killed and fifty-four taken prisoners. The other was from the Russian Embassy, and set forth that General Langiewicz, in the south had been defeated with exactly the same loss of 400 killed and fifty-four taken prisoners. Such a coincidence was certainly to be accepted as a warning against accepting too readily the statements which came—as he presumed this had done—through the Russian Embassy at Paris. So far from thinking that the defeat of the nominal commander-in-chief—and Langiewicz was no more, for there were fifty independent commanders in different parts of Poland, as perhaps under the circumstances was best for the cause—so far from thinking that the defeat of the nominal commander-in-chief involved the loss of the struggle, he believed that there was no ground whatever for discouragement. He had received information that a landed proprietor who had property worth £80,000 or £100,000 a year, which would be confiscated if the attempt failed, had joined the insurgents. So had a nobleman whose name was well known in England—Count Zamoyiski; and so, in fact, was every one doing of character and position that cared for his country. So far from being disheartened by the news just received, he regarded it simply as an indication of the desire of the Russians to get hold of the nominal commander-in-chief—a desire, of course, which was easily gratified, owing to the small number of men under Langiewicz; but he could not believe that the loss of a single feather from the wing of the Polish eagle would seriously affect its flight. Neither did he see that there was any reason, in the actual state of things, for the hope which had been expressed in a leading journal that the Czar would make those benevolent concessions to a defeated people which the editor seemed to think the present was a fitting occasion to offer. With reference to the details of the recent debate, he (Mr. Hennessy) might remind the House that the question he desired to bring before the House was, whether under existing circumstances England had not a moral obligation resting upon her to interfere in the cause of Poland. It was admitted by the noble Viscount at the head of the Government that England had a right, under the Treaty of

Mr. Hennessy

Vienna, to interfere; but if Russia violated that treaty to the injury of the Poles and to the danger of the peace of Europe, he asked the noble Lord whether to the bare legal treaty right there was not super-added a moral obligation arising from Lord Castlereagh and the Duke of Wellington having signed the treaty avowedly for the purpose of protecting the Poles and preserving the peace and security of Europe? What was the language used by diplomatists in dealing with this question? He knew of no diplomatist who was more worthy of attention than the noble Viscount himself; for though speaking in this House he had done what he did not think was often the case with the noble Lord—made use of expressions which were not perfectly accurate; yet in the despatches relating to the affairs of Poland, which were written in 1831 and 1832, but which were not published until 1861, he found that the word “obligations” was used very often, not only by the British Ambassador at St. Petersburg and by Count Nesselrode, the Russian Minister, but by the noble Lord himself. Writing on the 13th of April, 1831, to the noble Lord, who was then at the head of the Foreign Office, Lord Heytesbury said—

“Upon the receipt of your Lordship’s despatch of the 22d March, I thought it advisable not to lose any time in informing Count Nesselrode of the nature of the instructions I had received, and in touching upon the several points to which my attention was directed. This I did in the order in which they stood in your Lordship’s despatch, beginning with the obligations imposed upon us by the Treaty of Vienna, and the necessity in which England, as well as France, was placed, to watch over the progress of the war in Poland, and to remonstrate in the event of any measures being adopted on its conclusion at variance with existing engagements.”

A despatch addressed by the noble Viscount to Lord Heytesbury, dated November 3, contained the following passage:—

“The war being now over, and the authority of the Emperor as King being completely re-established in Poland, the time is come when His Majesty feels himself justified, both by his friendship for the Emperor of Russia and by the duty resulting from the obligations which he has contracted under the Treaty of Vienna, in addressing to His Imperial Majesty, in the most amicable tone, and with the deference which is due to his rights as an independent Sovereign, some observations as to the best mode of re-settling the kingdom of Poland under the dominion of the Emperor, on principles accordant with those on which its union with the Imperial Crown of Russia was originally formed, and in such a manner as may be most conducive to its future good government and tranquillity.”

Here, then, we found the noble Lord repeating the phrase formerly used by Lord Heytesbury—the “obligations” imposed upon England by the Treaty of Vienna. Count Nesselrode answered this despatch at great length, and seemed to think that the several parties to the Treaty of Vienna did not incur the same obligations—for instance, that though Russia might have incurred obligations under the treaty, England had not done so; to this the noble Lord very fairly replied as follows:—

“It is hoped that upon reflection the Russian Government cannot fail to see all the inconvenient and dangerous consequences which would flow from thus establishing different degrees of obligation among the Powers who have equally signed a general treaty.”

When the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir De Lacy Evans) in 1831 called attention to the affairs of Poland, the noble Lord said the Government were prepared to fulfil the “obligations” which England had contracted under the Treaty of Vienna, but he refused to tell what they were doing or to publish the papers. There could be no doubt, therefore, according to the noble Lord himself, that a moral obligation was contracted under that treaty, and that it was the duty of England to interfere, of course by diplomatic action and in concert with the other Powers, on behalf of Poland. It was an important fact that throughout the whole history of English diplomacy in regard to Poland the noble Lord had always refused to act in concert with the other Powers. He refused in 1831, when solicited by France to address a joint note to Russia—and here it might be remarked, in passing, that in his despatch asking for the co-operation of England the French Minister spoke of the Poles having the “guarantee” of the Treaty of Vienna. We now knew that at the time of the Crimean war the same overture for joint action in regard to Poland was made to England by France, and was again rejected by the noble Lord at the head of the Government. Now, for a third time the noble Lord had the case of Poland in his hands; and the House would probably like to know whether the French Government had solicited the co-operation of England in diplomacy; and, if so, whether its request had been refused. In a recent remarkable speech delivered in the French Senate, M. Billault reviewed the policy of the noble Lord in 1831, and denounced “many words and little actions” as a mode of treatment which should no longer be applied to Poland. That was in fact exactly what the noble Lord’s policy in regard to Poland had actually been, and he was glad that M. Billault had publicly condemned it. The speech of the Imperial Minister was said, on the highest authority, to be an accurate interpretation of the policy of the Emperor. M. Billault had, moreover, thrown out a hint which was of great importance—he had hinted that a Congress might be necessary to settle the question of Poland. Were they to believe that the word “Congress” would have been used in M. Billault’s speech if it were not considered a matter of serious importance? He would certainly not have ventured to do so if the Emperor was not prepared to recommend such a measure. He should like to know from the noble Lord whether an application had been made to him to address a joint note to Russia with regard to Poland, and whether, if that had been refused, the noble Lord was prepared to reiterate the old exploded argument which he used in 1831, when he declined a similar proposal—namely, that he relied on the benevolent intentions of the Czar? He (Mr. Hennessey) had no faith in the “benevolent intentions” of the Czar. The Czar himself told Count Zamoyiski that his future policy in Poland would be one of terror and extermination; and certainly he had kept his word as far as he was able. If the noble Lord praised the Czar and the Grand Duke Constantine in the language held in that House not long ago, the impression would be created that our Government had attempted in 1863 to repeat the course it took in 1831. But he (Mr. Hennessey) ventured to say that the people of this country would be sorry to hear that the Prime Minister was about to follow his old policy—a policy which in his opinion was a mean policy, unsuited to the position of England, and most dangerous also to Europe. If France were left to take up this question by herself, the balance of power and the peace of Europe might be jeopardized. These evils would be averted only by a joint action between the two Powers. If France went alone into this matter, there might possibly be “a rectification of frontiers.” On that, which was the lowest ground, the noble Lord ought to be cautious how he refused to co-operate with the French Government. He begged, therefore, to ask the noble Lord whether it was his opinion that no moral obligation existed on the part of England with regard to the stipulations of the Treaty of Vienna affecting Poland?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, the hon. and learned Gentleman gave notice of a very short and simple Question, but he did not give notice of his intention to go into a dissertation as to the relative prospects of the Russian army, and of the Poles who are acting in resistance to that army. I shall not follow him through that dissertation, nor say anything that will imply any opinion as to the probable results and termination of that contest. Everybody has equal means of judging for himself. When, on a former occasion, the hon. and learned Gentleman mooted the question of the obligations resulting from the Treaty of Vienna, I understood him, as I think the House must have done, to imply that there was in that treaty an obligation upon Great Britain to make war—to interfere forcibly in the affairs of Poland. My answer was, that there is no such obligation. There is a right if she thinks fit to exercise it; but there is no engagement entered into by Great Britain in that treaty which imposes on her the obligation of interfering, by force of arms, to give effect to her interpretation of the articles of that instrument. To that interpretation I entirely and completely adhere. I maintain that it is a just exposition of the effect of the treaty. I said, that where a treaty between different Powers does not contain an express stipulation guaranteeing, on the part of any or all of the Powers, any particular arrangement established by the treaty, there is a right on the part of each contracting party to enforce the arrangement if it thinks the object within its means of doing so; but there is no obligation, unless there is a specific stipulation such as I have named. But the hon. and learned Member now entirely shifts his ground and talks of a moral obligation. But instead of it being a moral obligation to interfere by force of arms, by the quotation he has made from a despatch of mine to Lord Heytesbury he shows that the interposition, which I then contended we were under an obligation to make, was one of a totally different kind from that which he urged on a former evening. What is the despatch which the hon. and learned Member quotes? It is a despatch in which I said that the insurrection being over, and the Russian Government having re-established its authority in Poland, Her Majesty's Government, in fulfilment of the engagement contracted by them under the Treaty of Vienna, proceeded to represent in friendly terms to the Emperor of Russia considerations as to the arrangements he should make on the restoration of tranquillity in Poland. Well, that is a very different obligation from that which I understood him to argue for on a previous occasion. That obligation was fulfilled in the sense in which it was quoted; because the British Government did at that time make a friendly representation to the Emperor of Russia, urging what they thought it fitting for the Emperor to do with regard both to the obligations he had contracted by treaty, and to what was right and just with respect to the Poles themselves. In that sense I accept the interpretation of the hon. and learned Member; and when the proper time comes to lay before the House the papers showing what has been done and is doing, I am persuaded the House will perceive, that as far as any obligation upon the British Government to make friendly representations to the Emperor of Russia on behalf of the Poles goes, that obligation has been completely fulfilled. With regard to the question which the hon. and learned Member has put, as to the communications going on between the French and English Governments in reference to the manner in which any representation should be made, I am sure the House will feel that it would not be useful, even if it were fitting, for me to enter into details as to that which is now passing on this subject. But when the hon. and learned Gentleman reproaches us, and me especially, with not having during the Crimean war consented to a proposal—if such proposal had been made—to transfer the seat of operations from the Crimea to Poland, I think the decision of Her Majesty's Government was the only rational and sensible decision that could have been come to. The war began in a Turkish question; it began for the purpose of protecting Turkey from invasion and attack by Russia. We were occupied, in conjunction with France, in obtaining the security of Turkey from Russian aggression. And be it remembered that that war commenced by a quarrel between France and Russia on a Turkish matter—that, in truth, it was France which began the war, or, at least, the dispute out of which the war originated. France, therefore, was not a party entitled to ask us—before we had obtained in the Black Sea that security which we thought necessary—to relinquish our half-accomplished enterprise, and embark in another operation totally unconnected with the origin and cause of the war. I contend, therefore, that we acted properly in saying, “Let us finish what we have begun—namely, the protection of Turkey—and when that is ended, we may then see whether there is any ground for engaging in a new dispute with Russia on a question wholly distinct from that which gave rise to the first.” We were perfectly justified, then, in not agreeing to suspend those operations in order to embark in a totally different matter. With regard to the still earlier period of 1831, there were at that time considerations which induced us to decline entering into what promised to be likely to lead to serious differences between England and Russia. We did make the representations which the hon. and learned Gentleman has quoted, and although, unfortunately, they were not attended with the success we could have wished, still we did as much as diplomatically we could do. And I beg the House to bear in mind—because it is well to recollect it in the course of these discussions—that the hon. and learned Gentleman now confines his interpretation of the Treaty of Vienna to this:—that we have an obligation, in cases in which the interests of Poland are concerned, to interfere diplomatically on behalf of that country. I believe, Sir, we shall convince the House that we have done our duty in this case, and that our efforts have at all events done some good to those on whose behalf they were made.

COMMAND PAY IN CAVALRY REGIMENTS.—RESOLUTION.

COLONEL NORTH said, he rose to move, That this House will, To-morrow, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of an humble Address, to be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that the same command pay shall be granted to Officers commanding regiments of Cavalry as is now given to Officers commanding regiments of Infantry. The hon. and gallant Member said, that his reason for moving his Amendment was, that ever since 1806 every officer commanding an Infantry regiment or the Horse Artillery had received the allowance, while it was not paid to the Cavalry; and he appealed to the Secretary of War to do justice in the matter. The amount in question was only £500 a year; but this had nothing to do with the justice of the case.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “this House will, To-morrow, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of an humble Address to be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that the same command pay shall be granted to Officers commanding regiments of Cavalry as is now given to Officers commanding regiments of Infantry,”—instead thereof.

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

SIR GEORGE LEWIS observed, that the hon. and gallant Member had shown his good sense and judgment in making a very short speech on a subject which, in fact, lay in a very narrow compass, and he should imitate his example of brevity. The sum which was at issue was about £920 per annum. The pay of a lieutenant-colonel of infantry amounted to 17*s.* per diem, and 3*s.* command money—making together 20*s.* a day. A lieutenant-colonel of cavalry had 23*s.* per diem; he had no command money, but was subject to some deductions—the stoppage of 8½*d.* for the keep of four horses, making 2*s.* 10*d.*; so that the exact amount received was 20*s.* 2*d.* per diem. The only difference, therefore, between the daily pay of the lieutenant-colonel of infantry and the lieutenant-colonel of cavalry was the sum of 2*d.* He admitted that there were certain expenses which lieutenant-colonels of cavalry were subject to which lieutenant-colonels of infantry were not, and he was not, therefore, altogether prepared to justify the equity of withholding from the lieutenant-colonels of cavalry the difference. The Estimates had passed for this year, and it was not worth while to bring up a supplementary Estimate. What he proposed was this:—He would undertake to consider the question during the present year; and unless the opinion he had expressed underwent a change, he should, if he had again the honour of moving the Army Estimates, undertake to propose that the change suggested by the hon. and gallant Member should be made.

COLONEL NORTH said, he was quite satisfied, and was very much obliged to the right hon. Baronet.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

CHINA—GENERAL BURGEVINE.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the statement of General Burgevine respecting the causes of the late mutiny of the Chinese drilled troops, published in The Friend of China of the 17th of January, 1863, has been received at the Foreign Office, together with the protest of all his Officers, forty-five in number, against the attempt of the Chinese authorities to obtain his head by the offer of 50,000 taels, or for his secret apprehension, and threatening to resign if he is murdered? His hon. Friend (Mr. Layard), in answering the Question he put the other evening, denied all knowledge on the subject and charged his correspondent with untruthfulness. The following day (Saturday) the China mail arrived, and brought a confirmation of the accounts he had received by the previous mail, and which led him to put his Questions. General Burgevine published his statement of the causes which led to the mutiny, and his own conduct, which had been arraigned. He stated, that on the 2nd of January, 1863, his troops in garrison at Sung-Kiong were absolutely without subsistence for the want of pay for a lengthened period. On the 2nd of January he went to Shanghai to receive the pay from the Government banker, Takee, who said it was ready to be paid; but, instead of receiving it, he met with the "grossest abuse." On returning to his troops he found they had affixed proclamations in the city, threatening to take the lives of the Mandarins and pillage the city. Fearing these consequences and for the safety of his European officers, General Burgevine pledged himself to obtain their pay in two days, and started a second time for Shanghai, taking now with him a few men of his body guard. He found the money ready packed, and he took it; but an altercation again ensued, and he unfortunately struck Takee, the banker. The Chinese local authorities immediately issued a proclamation charging him with treason and robbery, and deposing him from his command and offering a reward for his head. This official act excited the indignation of his European officers, and on the 10th of January they issued the following Protest, signed by forty-five Europeans, and which appeared in the Friend of China, and other

Shanghai newspapers of the 17th of February, 1863:—

"We, the undersigned officers of the Ward Force, commanded by General Burgevine, do hereby protest against the late actions of the Chinese authorities in his affairs."

"We are perfectly satisfied that he has always acted in a straightforward and open manner, and he has never been accused of the slightest offence against the military laws recognised by European Powers: we do not now, nor did we ever, consider ourselves liable to punishment by any others."

"In reference to the late occurrence in Shanghai, we know nothing more of that affair, than that it was absolutely necessary to obtain the money immediately, for the preservation of the force, and the safety of the European and Chinese officials."

"We also protest against the brutal attempt of the Chinese authorities to obtain the head of General Burgevine—50,000 taels being the sum offered for it, or for his secret apprehension. Should such a thing take place, we solemnly pledge ourselves, not only not to serve the Chinese authorities any longer, but would make such representation to the Imperial Government at Peking as would lead to the just punishment of his murderers."

[Signed by nine Majors, thirty Captains, three Lieutenants, three Gunners and Drivers, Clerks and Storekeepers.]

"Sung-Kiong, January 10th, 1863."

These events must necessarily cause a very painful feeling in the minds of many families in England; for Her Majesty's Government, having permitted naval and military officers and other British subjects to take service with the Emperor of China, their lives were never safe from the caprices of the corrupt local officials, over whom the distant Peking Government had really little control. He must beg his hon. Friend for the future to be more cautious in accusing his correspondents in China of want of truth, founded upon the ignorance of the Foreign Office of events known to every European in China.

MR. LAYARD said, he was afraid he could not give his hon. and gallant Friend a more satisfactory answer than that he had given upon a former evening. It was only that morning that the Foreign Office had received a despatch from Mr. Consul Meadows, enclosing the article from The Friend of China to which the hon. and gallant Member had referred. He could not say whether the facts therein stated were true or not; but it appeared that General Burgevine, having had a slight difference with his banker, broke open his till and took away his money. Whether the General was justified in that proceeding he could not say. It was also announced that the local Chinese authorities had offered 50,000 taels for his head; but whether that offer was known to, or sanctioned by, the Chinese Government he had no information. The Foreign Office had received no official information but; when they did receive any, he would do his best to give a satisfactory reply to the hon. and gallant Member. He might add that all the correspondence relating to China was now upon the table of the House. The hon. and gallant Member had reprimanded the Foreign Office for their ignorance, and made a complaint that the truth of his informants had been disputed. The fact was, that the other evening he (Mr. Layard) had ventured to warn the hon. and gallant Member against relying too implicitly upon information he received from China; and he did so because he remembered that last year his hon. and gallant Friend made a statement in that House of some terrible atrocities committed at Shanghai, and read a letter stating that prisoners had been given up by English officers to the Chinese authorities, and were put to death in their presence. He was persuaded that there was no truth in the statement, because he believed it impossible that English officers could have been guilty of such conduct; but a circular was sent to every Consul in China enclosing the statement made by the hon. and gallant Gentleman, and asking for information. In reply, the Foreign Office received distinct and positive assurances that not a single word of that statement was true, and he defied his hon. and gallant Friend to state the name of the writer of that letter. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had also told them that the Taepings had established a custom-house, and had published tariff regulations; but the Consuls in China all denied that any tariff regulations had been published by the Taepings. He thought, therefore, he was fully justified in cautioning the hon. and gallant Member against putting too implicit reliance on correspondence he might receive from China.

COLONEL SYKES explained that the letter which he had referred to had been first published in India.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Original Question again proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £956,365, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Manufacturing Departments, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864, inclusive."

Question again proposed, "That the Item of £35,871, for Establishments, be reduced by the sum of £2,000."

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that the reduction of £2,000 he had moved from this Vote was the amount of salary paid to Sir William Armstrong. That Gentleman had resigned his office; and as the Secretary for War had not told them how he was going to apply the amount of salary that would be thus saved, there could be no reasonable objection to the reduction of the Vote. He understood that there was some idea of creating a new office, to be held by a general officer, whose duty would be to inspect the various Government establishments. He (Sir H. Willoughby) thought that the only effect of such an appointment would be to shut out the only daylight which the system admitted. He objected to the continual increase in the amount of charges for the nine establishments included in the Vote, which in less than ten years had grown from £15,500 to nearly £30,000. It was expedient, in his opinion, to put some limits on these establishments. There had been a very large decrease in the Vote for Stores, and, as a natural consequence, the charge for establishments ought to be reduced. Colonel Boxer, the head of the laboratory at Woolwich, and a most valuable public servant, had stated that in three months he could supply as much shot and shell as had been expended in the siege of Sebastopol; and therefore, with such resources, it was difficult to conceive why, in time of peace, the establishments should be increased. In the last four years the Elswick Company alone had been paid upwards of £700,000, and £1,100,000 had been paid for iron ordnance. The expenditure was enormous, and he wished to know when it was to be reduced. He agreed in the opinion of Mr. Hawes and Mr. Godley, that to a certain extent Government manufactories were desirable; but that they ought to be watched carefully, and that the public should be assured that they got the value for the money expended. He wished to know what was the amount of the forfeit to be paid under the indenture of 1859 to the Elswick Company, and whether it was now intended to suspend the operation of the gun factory? It would also be very desirable to know the cost of these armaments. What, for example, would be the cost of a 100-pound shot fired at the Taepings? A 100-pound shell at present costs 17s. This would give some idea of the cost to the nation of firing these shot at half-savage nations. However well managed these manufacturing establishments might be—and he gave full credit in this respect to certain departments at Woolwich—they were maintained at an enormous cost. But we were very much in the dark as to what those establishments really cost. In 1860, Mr. Anderson and Mr. Arbuthnot, in their evidence, said that the accounts of the store and manufacturing departments were not in a satisfactory condition. The country was kept in the dark because there was no balance sheet—he meant no general balance-sheet. There were balance-sheets for portions of the departments, but not for the whole; and on the 9th of July, 1862, Colonel Boxer admitted that he had never made out a complete balance-sheet. Again, when the Accountant General was examined, he stated that the accounts of 1860-1 had not then been audited. There ought to be duly certified balance-sheets submitted to an independent audit, otherwise the authorities were working in a circle. He moved this reduction because he thought it a reasonable and a wise one, and also because he thought it right that the attention of the House should be called to the costly nature of these establishments. The word “balance-sheet” was not enough; there must be a balance-sheet framed on proper principles, for he had seen plenty of such documents which were not worth a farthing. In the balance-sheet of a private firm allowance was duly made for rates and taxes, insurance, depreciation of plant, and interest on capital; but these items did not usually appear in Government balance-sheets. He believed that the end of the present system was approaching, and he hoped that the Committee would agree to the reduction which he now proposed, of £2,000 on account of establishments.

GENERAL PEEL said, that the Government ought to be able to show a regular debtor and creditor account, and their establishments ought to be conducted on the same principles of account as commercial men conducted their private establishments. The reduction in the establishments was not in proportion to the reduction in the Votes; for there was a large reduction in this Vote, but the reduction in the establishment was only one seven-hundredth part of the reduction in the Vote; and in this and the following Vote the reduction was greater than the difference between the total amount of the Estimates for this year and for last year:—that was to say, that the whole reduction of £1,000,000 shown in the Estimates was in these two Votes. He confessed that he looked upon the explanation that had been given by his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War, with respect to the reduction in these two Votes, with alarm. He saw in them greater cause for alarm as to future expenditure than in all the rest of the Estimates. It was not shown on the Estimates, but the right hon. Gentleman told them that only £5,000 was taken this year for the production of ordnance, the Government having—very wisely—decided to suspend the production of rifled ordnance until it was decided which was the best. The Committee would see that this was only the postponement of a service, and that the postponement must swell the Estimates hereafter; for if Sir William Armstrong or Mr. Whitworth, or any one else, should produce a gun superior to that now employed, it would have to be adopted, and the expenditure involved up to that time would have to be incurred over again. He did not know what number of guns were required for the fortifications now in course of construction, but he believed that the cost of them would not be covered by the fortification loans, but would be chargeable to army grants; and he should like to see a general Return of the number required, to the furnishing of which he did not see there could be any objection, although it might be inexpedient to state the armament of any particular place. There was a Return from the Ordnance Department, showing that the number of guns completed up to the 1st of March, 1862, was 1,935, of which number one-third were 110-pounders; but it was evident from the recent experiments at Shoeburyness, that guns of far heavier calibre would have to be adopted; and not one of these was provided for in the Estimates—indeed, as yet they had got only experimental guns. All these facts went to prove that those who looked for a speedy and permanent reduction of the Army Estimates would be disappointed. There was a difference between the Estimate for the present year and the expenditure for 1858-9 of exactly £2,000,000. Part of the increase was to be accounted for by the difference of the manner in which the accounts with the Indian Government were kept. [Sir GEORGE LEWIS: And the militia is included.] So it was in the expenditure for 1858-9. After allowing for the difference in the mode of keeping the Indian accounts, the actual excess shown in the Estimates of the present year, over the expenditure of 1858-9, was between £1,100,000 and £1,200,000; and not one shilling of that excess was caused by any item of expenditure for the regular army; it arose from the manufacture of ordnance stores, rendered necessary by modern discovery. The increase and improvement of ordnance necessarily involved expense; and he feared that the expenditure on account of ordnance, which in 1858-9 was £600,000, was more likely to reach £2,000,000 than to be reduced to £600,000. He did not perceive the probability of the Government being able to make a reduction, nor did he think that the country was in such a state that it could not provide for any necessary expenditure; but if expenditure was not absolutely necessary, there was no degree of prosperity which could justify the Government in incurring it. His present object was to show that the apparent reduction in the Estimates proceeded from a postponement of services which must fall upon future Estimates, rather than from a real reduction in the Estimates themselves; and to press upon the right hon. Gentleman the importance of a debtor and creditor account being kept for the large manufacturing establishments.

Sir Henry Willoughby

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that he submitted to the contract Committee, with the sanction of the late Sir Benjamin Hawes, a form of Return for the Enfield establishment, and it was approved by the Committee; but in reporting the products of the establishment the form of Return had been adopted only in one year; so that it was impossible not only to compare the products in point of cost with those made by private contractors, but the cost of the establishment and its productions from year to year.

SIR MORTON PETO believed that any Government were not in a position to command the skill requisite for the carrying on of their extensive establishments. When the Armstrong gun was invented, it was thought that this country would possess a weapon which all the world beside would be without. Great secrecy was observed, and Sir William Armstrong was made a Government officer. But now, after expending £2,000,000 or £3,000,000, and erecting factories at Woolwich and Elswick, Sir William Armstrong had resigned, and the Government had to pay him a very large sum for his manufactory in the North; he possessed the means of supplying ordnance to the whole world, and the Government had thus lost the skill which they heretofore considered necessary for the superintendence of that particular branch of their works. This was a point that ought not to be lost sight of if the Government were determined to be their own manufacturers; but if they would only learn when to buy and how to buy, they need not manufacture at all, but would have all the manufactories of the world at their command. As it was, the country would soon present the anomaly of a Government unable to trust any of its private manufacturers, who at the same time would be supplying all the rest of the world. All that the Government need do was to have specifications clearly drawn out, and to select contractors of high character, reserving the right to strike off their list those that did not deal honestly. This they had done satisfactorily in regard to the building of marine engines, and in no instance had they been disappointed. A manufacturer must have skill to purchase and to organize labour, and no man would do these so well for Government as he would for himself. He agreed with the hon. and gallant Officer opposite, that as soon as the Government had appointed a successor to Sir William Armstrong, and had made up their minds as to the best kind of ordnance, there would be a large expenditure; and in another year it would be found that the Estimates had not been reduced at all, because this year there was not the same ratio of stores that there had been previously. The only reason that the Estimates of this year were less than the Estimates of last year was, that the Government found themselves at fault with regard to the manufacture of ordnance, and they very properly hesitated before committing themselves further. He trusted the hon. Baronet would divide the House, because it was time a check was placed upon these establishments.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH observed, that the manufacturing branches at Woolwich were well conducted in themselves, but required to be harmonized with each other. In appointing an officer to superintend all the establishments, the Government were taking a very necessary and useful step; and he believed they had chosen a very good man for the post. At the same time, while approving the appointment, he believed that the funds wanted for it might be procured by making a reduction in the staff. He was surprised to hear hon. Members talking as if the Government ought to give up manufacturing altogether. With improvements continually taking place in gunnery, it would be most unwise and unsafe to intrust the manufacture of ordnance entirely to the trade, who had neither the same interest in nor the same means of conducting experiments and keeping pace with the progress of the times. He did not believe that gun-carriages could be made in any private factory equal to those at Woolwich; it was a notorious fact that the trade could not manufacture gunpowder calculated to produce the same results as cheaply as the Government. It would therefore be very unwise to trust entirely to the private trade for the production of commodities which the private trade was not accustomed to produce. The Government establishments could keep pace with the improvements which were from day to day being effected; but the staff employed ought to be reduced in proportion to the reduction in the quantity required from them.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Committee would observe that upon the Vote under consideration there was a diminution upon the establishments this year, as compared with the last, of £435,000; and upon the next Vote which was for Warlike Stores, there was a diminution of £698,000. The complaints, therefore, that had been made with regard to increased items for Establishments and Government Works did not apply to the present Estimates. With respect to the Manufacturing Departments, the Estimate for last year for the Supervising Establishments was £36,600, whereas for this year it was £35,800, showing not a very considerable diminution, but certainly not an increase. They had now only to deal with the Estimates for the present year. He did not undertake to make prospective Army Estimates. Next year they would have to consider the Estimates for that year, and would then see whether upon the whole there would be an increase as compared with the present year. It was sufficient

Sir Frederic Smith

if he showed that the Vote that he asked for would leave them with sufficient guns and sufficient stores in the magazines, and that the military service ran no danger of being crippled; and on the authority of the military advisers of the War Office he was enabled to state that these would be sufficient. With regard to the general question of Government manufactories, there were two conditions, which, if it was not necessary, it was, at all events, important, should be fulfilled when an article was manufactured, not by Government, but by a contractor. The first was, that the article manufactured should be capable of easy verification by inspection; and next, that it should be of a sort for which there was a demand by the general public, and was not exclusively consumed by the Government. If hon. Members would cast their eye down the list of articles mentioned in this Vote, they would see that the articles manufactured were exclusively those for which there was no general demand in the country, but which were used exclusively by Government. A manufacturer, before he could lay down plant or machinery for which there was no demand by private individuals, but which was exclusively used by Government, said to the Government, "You must give me a security that my money will not be thrown away; you must guarantee me a certain annual amount of orders; or you must advance money to me for the machinery and plant." Experience showed, that whenever private contractors contracted to furnish Government with articles of which Government was the only consumer, they must in effect be subsidized. If the Government wished to provide itself with a certain number of yards of cloth or cotton, or a certain number of pairs of shoes, there was no such difficulty, because those were articles in general demand, and he could not conceive any justification for a Government setting up manufactories of such articles. But it was different in the case of guns, or gunpowder, or muskets. Those were the general principles that appeared to him to govern the question of Government manufacture. He confessed that when he entered upon his present office, his opinions were that it was expedient for Government, in all cases where it was possible, to employ private contractors; but yielding to pressure of facts, he satisfied himself that it was not so easy as hon. Gentlemen seemed to think, to obtain a regular and cheap supply from private contractors. His hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Sir Morton Peto) said he (Sir George Lewis) had omitted one difficulty under which the Government laboured—namely, the difficulty of obtaining skilled assistance. But he did not admit the justice of the remark. Colonel Boxer, Mr. Anderson, Colonel Dixon, and other heads of departments, were most accomplished manufacturers; and though their pay was not high, their labour was great, and he believed them to be able to compete in skill, with any private manufacturer in the kingdom. He therefore thought that no advantage would arise from giving up the manufacture of ordnance in the Government factories; and that if they did, the guns supplied would not be so perfect in execution, and that no economy would result to the public. Gentlemen connected with the accounts department of the War Office, stated before the Ordnance Committee last Session that they believed that guns of a certain class (12-pounders), produced in the Woolwich factory, cost the Government about 50 per cent less than those supplied by the Elswick Company. He did not wish to make himself responsible for the principle on which the statement was founded, and it was difficult to make a fair comparison between that which was manufactured in a Government factory and that which was manufactured in a private factory; but he had formed the opinion that no advantage would be derived from closing the Government factories. He now came to the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir H. Willoughby), who said the system of accounting was very defective. He must take the liberty of entirely disputing that assertion. [Sir HENRY WILLOUGHBY observed, that he quoted from the evidence of Mr. Anderson.] Mr. Anderson's evidence was given three years ago. Mr. Anderson was no doubt thoroughly master of the system of accounts, and when he stated that at that time they were defective, he no doubt stated what was correct. But at present the accounts of the Government departments included in the Army Estimates were audited in the most complete manner. They were audited for the year ending last March, and they could at any moment be laid on the table. They exhibited not only the cash account but the capital account. At the same time they exhibited a statement of all the articles in store, and they also showed how much of each sort was manufactured in the course of the year, and what was the cost of each article. Nothing more complete could be furnished. Perfect securities were taken for the custody of the stores. The person in charge of each store had a list given to him of the articles when he took charge, and he was called upon to account for the articles. Every year a survey was held at all the stations, when not only was the condition of the stores ascertained, but certain stores were counted as samples of the correctness of the stock in hand; that was to say, stock was taken not completely but in the way of sample, and every five years there was a complete stock-taking, and every single article was examined, and was compared with the lists. These checks applied to the foreign stations as well, and the War Office was at any time able to furnish an account of the stores at any foreign station, such as, for instance, the station at the Ionian Islands. He thought that in this respect at least it was impossible to say that there was any neglect on the part of the Government. As far as the skill shown in the manufacture and the mode of accounting for the article produced went, no reasonable objection could be made; the general principle of having Government manufactories was, of course, a matter always open to discussion; but the practical issue of the hon. Baronet's proposal was to reduce the column for establishments by £2,000. The proposal was based on the fact that the office lately held by Sir William Armstrong had become vacant. Now, the vacancy of an office did not necessarily constitute economy. The usual course when an office became vacant, unless it was a sinecure, which the office lately held by Sir William Armstrong certainly was not, was to fill it up. However, he was ready to admit that some economy could be effected in the case of the office now vacant; and he had in contemplation a plan by which a saving could be effected in the gun factory, and at the same time an appointment might be made by which an inspection of the different establishments at Woolwich could be effected which did not now exist. At present, the head of each factory inspected his own work—a system which, though no serious inconvenience could be said to have resulted from it, was hardly consonant with the idea of a proper control over those who expended large sums of public money. He therefore proposed to appoint a military officer as inspector of the artillery and other articles manufactured at Woolwich. He had no wish to keep up establishments beyond the point which was absolutely necessary, but the Committee should bear in mind, that with respect both to these manufactories and to the army itself, it was important to have a framework which admitted of being called into operation when a sudden emergency arose. What was now passing across the Atlantic showed how an enormous expense might be created by the want of an adequate machinery ready at hand, and one of the advantages which we possessed was that we had such a machinery, capable of being called into activity whenever it might unhappily be needed. He promised, however, that everything should be managed on the most economical standard, and with this explanation he trusted that the hon. Baronet would not press his Amendment. If a division were taken, he hoped the Committee would support the original Vote.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he thought the right hon. Baronet had not succeeded in showing the Committee that it had any real control over the Estimates of that Department. If the reduction now made in the Vote for stores did not involve any sacrifice of efficiency, the corresponding Vote of last year must have been greatly in excess of the public requirements; and if it were true that since the Estimates were prepared an order had been given for 100 Armstrong guns of large size, what became of the reduction? The right hon. Gentleman took a considerable sum this year for guns; yet a Committee had been appointed to determine what was the best gun for the service, or rather, as it would now appear, only to decide between the Armstrong and Whitworth guns, of which the specimens submitted may be of hitherto untried patterns. That was a practical confession that Sir William Armstrong, after all the costly experiments he had made, was not satisfied with the weapon that had been supplied to the service, and was still going on experimenting. The inquiry before the Committee ought to be thrown open to all inventors, and then we might ultimately secure the best gun for the country. It was most important that we should not accumulate a large stock of weapons that were practically obsolete. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to adopt a new system of inspection. Now, it was necessary, before they passed the Vote, that they should know exactly what was intended. It was given in evidence before the Ordnance Committee of last Session, that a system of independent inspection was under the consideration of the War Office some years ago; but the late Lord Herbert afterwards addressed a letter to the manufacturing establishments at Woolwich requiring the inspection to be conducted by the persons who were from day to day charged with the responsibility for their manufactures. Any inspection to be effective and real must be made in the departments where the different processes were carried on, otherwise it would be impossible to tell whether the guns and shells manufactured had flaws in them or not. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman in what branch of the manufacturing departments at Woolwich the want of the proposed system of independent inspection had been experienced. In the only branch in which it had been tried, it had broken down. If inspection were to be more than a name, it would cost much more than £2,000 a year. There must, in fact, be a numerous staff, with an inspecting officer for every one of the departments.

MR. MONSELL was afraid the hon. Gentlemen who were so anxious to go to dinner, hardly appreciated the importance of the subject before the Committee. The real question was, whether they should completely revolutionize the existing system? It certainly seemed to him that unless the statement which the hon. Baronet had made, and which he (Mr. Monsell) now confirmed, could be refuted, it would be absurd to change a system which had been completely successful during the Crimean war, and in spite of difficulties of the most formidable character. He must call upon his right hon. Friend to name the instances in which the slightest failure had taken place in the inspection carried on under the present system. Was the opinion of Lord Panmure, who had seen the working of the existing plan during our great contest with Russia, of no moment? Or was the late Lord Herbert no authority? That noble Lord, when he first considered the question, admitted that his prejudices were in favour of the proposal now made by the Secretary for War; but subsequent investigation had satisfied him that the proposal was dangerous and bad. The right hon. Baronet was going, in fact, not only to create a useless place for some military officers, but to multiply the existing expense on account of inspection four or five-fold. He hoped the Committee would not imperil a system which he contended was a perfect success.

Sir George Lewis

COLONEL DUNNE said, he was of an entirely different opinion as to the working of this system. He had the greatest respect for the opinion of Lord Panmure and the late Lord Herbert, but in the present instance he believed they were both wrong. No doubt, the incapacity displayed in the Crimea was the cause of serious military disasters, and the Government were now acting wisely in reversing that policy and placing distinguished military officers at the heads of the several departments, who were well acquainted with the best mode of working them. In the course that he was following he was sure that the right hon. Gentleman was doing that which was for the welfare of the country, and he did not believe that there was a single military man but would back him.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS was certainly rather surprised that the very modest proposal he had made with respect to alterations at Woolwich should have met with condemnation in the House. That it should have been condemned at Woolwich seemed very natural—he was quite prepared for disapprobation from the heads of the Woolwich departments; but that Gentlemen who had the control of the public purse should meet with censure a proposal for the simple inspection of the articles produced in the Government manufactories at Woolwich did fill him with surprise. With regard to the carriage department and the laboratory department, the persons charged with them inspected the produce of their own manufactories. He believed them to be highly honourable men, skilful in working, diligent and industrious; and he was perfectly prepared to say that no serious practical evil had arisen. But the Committee must see that was a system which did not contain within itself the elements of perfect control, and a time might arise when serious practical inconvenience might occur. With regard to the gun-factory, he believed there had been some imperfect external inspection; but it had been very little, and it could not be said that no practical inconvenience had been felt. His proposal was not a revolution, nor did it contemplate an additional expense of £30,000 or £40,000. All he asked was to be allowed to take £2,000 a year, which was set free by the resignation of Sir William Armstrong, and he would undertake that the whole of that £2,000 should not be exhausted by the system of inspection which he proposed.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that the speech of the hon. Gentleman opened up a new question, which ought to be submitted as a distinct issue to the Committee. He should divide the House on the principle, that whenever a fair opportunity presented itself of reducing the public expenditure without injury to the public service, it should be eagerly seized upon.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 45; Noes 94: Majority 49.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(2.) £838,369, Warlike Stores.

COLONEL SYKES asked, who paid for the shot and shell supplied to the Chinese Government.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, any stores supplied from this country would be paid for, and the amount received by the British Exchequer.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £810,941, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the charge of the Superintending Establishment of, and Expenditure for, Works, Buildings, and Repairs at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864, inclusive.”

MR. CHILDERS called attention to the large expenditure upon the new barracks at Chelsea. For three years the total sum which the work was estimated to cost had been stated in the Votes at £140,000; but this year, for the first time, the amount had been raised to £187,000. The reason assigned was that there had been an excess on the cost of the foundations. But these had been put in long ago, and surely the excess was discovered before this year. The arrangement as to the building of these barracks was very unbusiness-like. Instead of this erection being placed under the authority of an officer of Engineers, a premium was offered to architects, and the successful competitor was allowed a percentage on the outlay. The Department then appeared to have gone to sleep, and let the architect do what he liked; and what was thought to be the last year of the expenditure arrived, when the House was told that an additional Vote of £47,000 would be required on account of the unusual cost of the foundations. For this oversight the architect was, of course, responsible; but then he obtained an additional commission on the £47,000. Again, the House had been told in previous years that the total expense of the barracks at Colchester, so far as the Government were aware, was £80,000; but now the cost appeared to be £92,000. There was an item of £15,329 for huts at Gibraltar, on which last year there remained to be voted £4,500 and nothing more. Yet this year £6,000 was asked for on this account. Last year there was what was supposed to be a final Vote for improving the defences at Malta; yet it now appeared, that instead of £172,000, the outlay in this respect was £196,842. Such changes as these ought not to be made without full information being afforded to the House. There was another item upon which further information ought to be given. Without wishing to impute any other than straightforward conduct to the right hon. Gentleman, he must say that the manner in which the Votes for improving the defences of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick appeared to have been drawn looked as if concealment were the object in view. Last year £10,000 was asked for as a total Vote, and now they were told that this £10,000 was only the first instalment of an expenditure of £100,000—this expenditure, too, having been resolved on without communication with the local Government, whose first knowledge respecting it was obtained from the inquiries respecting the land. Greatly improved as was the form of these Votes, he complained that still they did not honestly show the amount to which it was intended that they should pledge the House.

COLONEL NORTH said, he had hitherto abstained from speaking on the subject of the fortification Votes; but now, considering the enormous sums to be expended on fortifications, he thought it important to ascertain that proper precautions were taken to secure the health and comfort of the troops placed within them. Last year he was at Eastbourne, at one end of which town there was an old redoubt, which had been repaired for the reception of troops assembled for the purpose of rifle practice. £5,000 had been spent upon this work. This redoubt had been occupied a short time since by a garrison of 135 Scots Fusilier Guards, and he (Colonel North) had been informed that the arrangements of the place were so bad, that accommodation of a certain necessary kind did not exist within the fort, so that the arrangements which had to be resorted to by the soldiers at night were too disgusting to be described. He trusted this state of things, which could not have existed for a single day in any gaol in England whilst the right hon. Baronet was Home Secretary, nor in any workhouse, would speedily be remedied, as he (Colonel North) understood a detachment of the Guards were about to be sent to the same place. One day he heard the men complain of the water. On inquiry he found that the men were compelled to drink rain water, which was often both foul and scarce. In consequence, he waited on the secretary of the local water company, his impression being that there must be some great engineering difficulties in the way of supplying the fort, or that the charges were exorbitantly high; but he found that the company would lay on the water for £28, and supply it at 1s. per thousand gallons, and only charge for the quantity actually consumed. He trusted that the right hon. Baronet would not lose an hour in putting an end to this disgraceful state of things.

MR. W. WILLIAMS complained of the large amounts which were being expended, or were about to be expended, upon public works in some of our colonies, especially at Ceylon, the Mauritius, and Nova Scotia; and also asked for information as to the places at which the amounts proposed to be taken for military schools and chapels, accommodation for married soldiers, sanitary services, and other similar purposes were to be expended.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH concurred with the hon. Member for Lambeth as to the right of the Committee to receive information on this subject. It appeared to be the desire of the Government to reform the east face of the Tower of London, and £10,000 was the amount taken for this work. This seemed to be wholly unnecessary, because the Tower could scarcely be considered as a work of defence, and was merely used as a great store warehouse; it was all very well to repair, but this was altering the character of the work, and was a whim that should not be indulged. At page 47, under the head "Various Stations," regimental schools and chapels and other works were mentioned. He (Sir Frederic Smith) should be glad to see the places specified by name where these works were to be constructed. The next item upon which he would remark was that of £450,000 for the defence of commercial harbours. He thought this was a very proper outlay, and that the works proposed were most important and most necessary. But he believed, that if this outlay were required, it had better be made at once. The whole cost intended to be expended was £450,000 — a sum of £206,000 had been voted, but only £121,900 had been expended. In consequence of this mode of procedure, the expense of superintendence was greatly increased. It would be much better to expend the money at once, and have done with it. He should also like to know of what materials these forts were to be constructed. If they were to be built of earth or stone, considering the increased power of modern artillery, a great mistake would be committed; but if they were to be constructed of iron, no one would complain of the system. He found also an item for additional accommodation at the Cape of Good Hope. For whom, he would ask, was this additional accommodation required? Then, again, there was the re-appropriation of the barracks at Warley, £10,000. He remembered the re-appropriation of Warley barracks three times over. Would the right hon. Gentleman state why this appropriation was to be made, and what was about to be done? Another item to which he wished to draw attention was that of £8,000 for the alteration of drainage and the utilizing of sewage at Aldershot. His experience in a Committee of this House last year had convinced him, that unless the circumstances were exceedingly favourable, no attempt to utilize sewage by its application to land would pay, and he was sure that in the case of Aldershot any expenditure with that object would be money thrown away.

SIR HENRY STRACEY said, he also desired to make a few remarks upon the dilatoriness of the Government with regard to the erection of forts for the defence of commercial harbours, and he would particularly instance the case of Yarmouth. The late Lord Herbert in 1859 promised that two batteries should be erected to protect Great Yarmouth, and his constituents had been led to expect that that promise would at once be acted upon; but, up to the present moment, the batteries had not even been commenced. Lord Herbert had, moreover, admitted that the roadstead at Great Yarmouth was of the utmost importance, and that he did so was not to be wondered at when it was borne in mind that no less than 600 or 700 vessels frequently took refuge there in certain winds; that the same winds might bring an enemy into the harbour; that it was easy of assault by gunboats, and that its commerce in the north seas had greatly increased of late years. No port on the east coast was so defenceless, no port was so easily defensible, and for no port had so little been done. The Defence Committee, he might add, had recommended that, in addition to building new batteries, the old ones at Great Yarmouth, which were in a dilapidated condition, should be repaired, and Lord Herbert, supported by the best professional authority, had so far acquiesced in that recommendation that land had been purchased for the purpose of carrying it into effect, which was now in the possession of the Government. He should wish, under these circumstances, to know why that port was left in its present defenceless state, and upon what ground the present Secretary for War refused to act upon the decision of Lord Herbert and the Engineers by whose opinions he was influenced? The hon. Baronet, in conclusion, moved that Great Yarmouth should be included in the Vote as one of the commercial harbours of the country, at which works of defence ought to be erected.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that as the Motion involved an increase of the Estimates, it could not, in accordance with the rules of the House, be put.

SIR HARRY VERNEY desired to press on the right hon. Baronet the expediency of establishing institutes for soldiers, and suggested that the old hospital at Aldershot might with advantage be converted to that purpose. He thought, he added, that it would tend to the promotion of the health, morality, and efficiency of the men encamped at Aldershot, if they were during the summer months to be placed under canvas as far as possible.

COLONEL SYKES, with reference to the note appended to the item of "Gibraltar," that "the change of site had caused an excess over the original Estimate," complained that greater care was not exercised in the first selection of a site for the purpose.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the Vote under this head last year was £995,000, and this year £810,000, being a diminution of £184,000, which could not be easily accomplished in this branch of the expenditure. Formerly these Votes were printed in a single column, showing the amount proposed to be voted in the course of the year. In consequence of the reasonable demands of the Committee, columns were added showing what was the original Estimate, how much had already been voted, and what additional sum was required. Unfortunately, it happened that Estimates were not unfrequently inadequate, and indeed it was almost impossible that the predictions which officers made of the amount required for works of the kind should invariably be realized. Unforeseen events occurred in the progress of the works. A change in the head of a department caused a change of intention. With an officer newly appointed new views were taken, fresh recommendations were made, and the plan originally submitted was departed from. This was not only the case in public affairs, but in private works, and any hon. Gentleman who had any experience in building would remember how he sometimes changed his mind in the progress of the work. He feared, that until they arrived at a period of ideal perfection, they could not expect to have immutable Estimates. He could certainly assure the Committee that the Estimates had been prepared with great care; and although it was difficult to insure perfect completeness, there was no intention to deceive. As to the barracks at Chelsea, he was free to admit that they will probably cost £47,000 more than the original Estimate, but it was an exceedingly good barrack, in the building of which modern improvements had been introduced; so that it was more commodious, more healthy, and far superior in every respect to the old barracks, such as Knightsbridge. As to Colchester, there was an excess of £2,000, but that was upon a total of £80,000. As to Walmer, it was converted into an Indian depôt, and the expense might be deemed to be met by the capitation grant. With regard to Nova Scotia, the Vote was for the expenses of fortifications at Halifax and St. John's. The fortifications at Halifax were looked upon as principally fortifications for naval purposes. It was one of our principal naval stations in the Northern Ocean, and the fortification of it was a matter of Imperial interest. With regard to St. John's, it was the place at which the troops were landed, and some expenditure there was of importance. It was for the Committee to consider whether they would vote these sums. He was quite aware that it was questioned whether we should spend any money on fortifications for the Colonies. He could only say, for his own part, that he was most unwilling to propose the expenditure of a single hundred pounds for the fortification of the Colonies which did not appear to be of Imperial interest. If Gentlemen were prepared to lay down the principle that they thought it desirable or that they were willing to entertain the question of emancipating the Colonies or handing them over to some foreign Power, he could understand the proposition; but it was hardly possible to renounce the duty of providing, to a certain extent, for the military defence of the Colonies as long as they formed an integral part of the Imperial dominions. There was one point to which he thought it right to advert, because he misled the Committee last year by a statement that £10,000 or £15,000, which was then voted, would be sufficient to complete the defences of the Mauritius. He was at the time under that impression; but on conferring with Sir John Burgoyne he found it was impossible, without more money, to place those defences in a state of tolerable efficiency. He therefore proposed this year an additional sum of £15,000, with the prospect of a further Vote to the extent of £34,000. With regard to Eastbourne, they were not regular barracks, and he would inquire whether it was possible to discontinue that item of expenditure. With regard to Great Yarmouth, he proposed this year to take a Vote for fortifications in the commercial harbours of the Mersey and the Humber; so that the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir H. Stracey) would see that the east coast was not neglected. He did not propose to take any Vote to fortify Great Yarmouth, for it was impossible for the Government to undertake to fortify the whole coast. The principle on which they had gone was to fortify our arsenals and those places wherein our military and naval strength resided, and to make them safe against the sudden attack of an enemy. With regard to the Tower, the expenditure for this year was £3,000, and the receipts from the Tower armoury were £2,636 for the year. Though of no great importance for defensive purposes, yet the Tower was connected with so many historical associations that the Committee, he thought, would not grudge the sum required for necessary repairs and alterations, especially as so large a portion was covered by the receipts.

Colonel Sykes

COLONEL NORTH said, that the explanation of the right hon. Baronet with regard to Eastbourne Barracks was very unsatisfactory. He should make further inquiries; and if he found that nothing had been done, he should bring the subject before the House in a distinct form.

SIR HENRY STRACEY said, the War Office had undertaken to defend Great Yarmouth by building two batteries, and he thought they were bound, in good faith, to carry out that undertaking.

MR. BAXTER said, he was not satisfied with the explanation as to the expenditure proposed for colonial fortifications. Last year the House, with the complete assent of the Government, agreed to Resolutions affirming that the self-governing Colonies ought to be called on to provide for their own defences. Earl Grey and Lord Herbert were examined before the Select Committee on this subject, and both of them stated that a large part of the expenditure on colonial fortifications was entirely wasted, and that frequently the sums voted were not fairly chargeable to the Imperial Exchequer. He himself, had moved a Resolution on the subject, but he had not pressed it, having been satisfied by the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, and the Under Secretary for the Colonies, that the Government were of the same mind as himself. Having looked very carefully through the Army Estimates, he was not at all satisfied with what the Government were doing this year to carry out the Resolutions agreed to last Session. It was proposed to vote £14,300 for fortifications and store-buildings in the Colonies which were self-governing. There was an increase in the item for Halifax, Nova Scotia. He should like the House to notice the fact, that, of a sum of £10,000 voted for those fortifications last year, only £1,891 had been expended. He was told that it was the intention to bring the whole outlay up to £100,000; but as only £1,891 out of the £10,000 already granted had been actually spent, the House had now an opportunity of expressing an opinion that this was not a proper application of British money. He did not think that in the Estimates before them, the right hon. Gentleman was carrying out the previously expressed intention of the House of Commons; and he therefore begged to move the reduction of the Vote by a sum of £10,000.

MR. HALIBURTON said, he had before taken the trouble of setting the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) right on the subject of the fortification of the Colonies, but found that he immediately got into the wrong path again. The hon. Gentleman set himself up in a manner to excite the reverence of the Colonies as a man of wonderful integrity and extraordinary disinterestedness. There was a foreigner who came to this country once, and whom, no doubt, many hon. Members had heard performing on the fiddle—he meant Paganini. He had only one string, and on that he played many tunes. The hon. Member for Montrose was more fortunate, for the Scotch fiddle he played on had two strings. There were two questions that he had taken under his particular patronage—namely, subsidies to ocean steamers and fortifications in the Colonies. Upon these strings he played the same tune every Session. He would ask whether the possession of a representative government was the gauge by which they could judge of the duty of a Colony to pay for her own fortifications? At Halifax there was a very large dockyard without a dock. There was a harbour there, and the place was a great military position; but he believed that no harm would be done to the people of Nova Scotia if the whole town was burnt. It consisted principally of wooden houses; and the only improvement it had undergone in his time was that which had succeeded several large fires. He complained very much of those continual discussions about the Colonies in an assembly where they were not represented.

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, he thought that the conduct of the British Government on the occurrence of the Trent affair showed that this country was not disposed to repudiate her obligations towards the Colonies; but it was quite a different question, whether we were bound to maintain the fortifications in all these Colonies; and he should therefore support the Motion for the reduction of the Vote. Those who held the doctrine that the Colonies should be defended by this country, and were prepared to grant large sums for that purpose, would do well to consider whether the construction of fortifications was likely to effect the object they had in view. Since the year 1815 over two millions sterling had been expended on fortifications at Bermuda, and yet there was not one fort there capable of resisting the attack of two French frigates. Sir John Burgoyne stated, in his evidence before the Committee, that the works at the Mauritius would require a further expenditure of about £300,000, and a garrison of 6,000 men. With such a number locked up in them these fortifications were elements rather of weakness than of strength. He believed that the true way to defend our colonial empire was to maintain command of the sea. Before the Committee agreed to that Vote, they ought to consider whether they were not about to involve themselves in an expenditure which was worse than fruitless.

Mr. DODSON said, that the arguments used in favour of the Amendment might be well founded, if applied to the erection of small fortifications to be held by small garrisons; but such was not the proposition submitted to the Committee. He quite concurred with the hon. Member for Taunton (Mr. Mills), that the maintenance of our colonial possessions depended on our naval supremacy; but that was a reason not for opposing, but for supporting the Vote—for, in order to retain that supremacy, it was necessary to have arsenals and dockyards in different parts of the world where a fleet could, in case of necessity, be refitted. Works and fortifications of the kind proposed, so far from scattering, tended to the concentration of our troops. If this country was engaged in hostilities in India, it would be found very convenient to have a considerable force at the Mauritius, which could be made available as the necessities of the case might require.

COLONEL NORTH said, his only objection to the Vote was that it was much too small. He thought the experience acquired last year, when troops were sent to the colonies, demonstrated the necessity that existed for having fortifications such as those which had been referred to in the course of the discussion.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS assured the Committee that the items composing this Vote had been carefully revised with a view to their reduction. He had been described by the hon. Member for Mon-trous (Mr. Baxter) as having stated, in the last Session, that it was not advisable to erect new works in the Colonies, or to make very expensive additions to existing works. By new works he must have meant works in places not at present fortified, and he believed that it would be found that it was not proposed by this Vote to fortify any place not yet fortified. With regard to the additions, he believed that what was proposed, so far from being extravagant, was of the most moderate description. The charge in Part 1, for "New Works Abroad" over £1,000, was £72,000, which could not be deemed an excessive sum when the objects in view and the cost of building were considered. Then, in Parts 2 and 3, the outlay for new works, additions, and repairs under £1,000 each, was only £9,800 in the former, and £15,057 in the latter case. About £2,800 was spent on Canada, and £884 on Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. As we had a considerable force in those parts at present, that expenditure was really very reasonable. The new works at Halifax and St. John's would be of great service for military and naval purposes. It was not in the power of the Government to compel the Colonies to pay these sums; and if the Committee would not vote the money, there was no prospect that it would be forthcoming elsewhere.

Mr. Arthur Mills

MR. BAXTER said, he must take the sense of the Committee on the matter.

MR. BUTT said, that to refuse to defend the Colonies was in effect to abandon them. If the Vote was rejected, the House should either compel the Colonies to construct works or leave them undefended. Having given them self-government, the House would not, by taxing them, raise again the question out of which the North American war of independence had arisen. If the Colonies were attacked, this country would have to protect them, and it was therefore an act of prudence to construct fortifications by means of which the defence of our possessions would be effective.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That a sum, not exceeding £800,941, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Superintending Establishment of, and Expenditure for, Works, Buildings, and Repairs at Home and Abroad, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864, inclusive."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 43; Noes 75: Majority 32.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(4.) £172,201, Military Education.

COLONEL NORTH asked, why it was that marks for good conduct did not count in the final examination of cadets. He thought that they should not only count, but should take precedence of all other marks. He thought, also, that in the selection of prizes a sword or something of that sort would be more valued than books.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS admitted the importance of good conduct, but said there was great difficulty in giving it value in an examination.

MR. W. WILLIAMS inquired, how it happened that the payment to the Lieutenant Governor of the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich had been increased from £500 to £1,000.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the real increase was only £200. The remaining £300 was paid by way of compensation for allowances.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH observed, that the Lieutenant Governor had now double the amount of duty and responsibility which he used to have. He noticed that the expenses of the Council amounted to £8,174. Why were the Indian Government not called upon to contribute more than £360 towards that amount?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS replied, that any change by which the Indian Government should contribute a larger sum would have his entire concurrence.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR had been told that the new buildings at Sandhurst were damp, and that the cadets had suffered in consequence.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the cadets were under the control of the Commander-in-Chief, and not that of the War Department.

MR. W. EWART asked what steps had been taken to introduce gymnasia into the army.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS pointed out that there was a Vote for an instructor of gymnastics, and also one for sanitary purposes.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £85,441, Surveys, &c.

MR. WYLD inquired why the Ordnance Survey for England was not completed, and what were the intentions of the Government with regard to the recommendations of the Committee of last year in reference to the survey upon a larger scale.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS explained that the 1-inch map was finished for all England, with the exception of a few of the northern counties, and the survey in those counties was now being completed. There was a large part of Scotland in which the survey was incomplete. The 6-inch map for Ireland had long been perfected. With regard to the survey of England on the 25-inch scale, which was limited at present to the six northern counties and a large part of Middlesex, the Government had decided that that survey ought to be continued. No Vote was asked this year for that purpose, but it was their intention next year to propose one.

COLONEL DUNNE wanted to know whether the advantages of the 25-inch scale were to be extended to Ireland, and whether the expense of the survey for England was to be placed upon the county rates?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS believed that it was proposed to extend the survey to Ireland.

MR. AYRTON understood that there was nothing in the present Vote which pledged the Committee to the 25-inch scale, his opinion of which was, that it would be perfectly useless.

MR. SCULLY believed that a 25-inch map would be a work of great national importance, and hoped that when the survey for England was perfected, a map of Ireland upon the same scale would be prepared.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) £88,135, Miscellaneous Services.

COLONEL DUNNE complained of an increase from £830 to £1,215, in the pay to the staff for the German Military Settlers at the Cape of Good Hope, and inquired how long this charge was to continue.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS observed, that these men were sent to the Cape at the termination of the Crimean war, and he could hold out no immediate hope of the charge being removed from the Estimates.

COLONEL DUNNE, referring to the item of £1,000 for medals, asked how it was that medals which had been earned years ago by soldiers, had not yet been delivered. He thought that this was a disgrace to the country.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that if the hon. and gallant Gentleman would specify to what particular medal his observation applied, he (Sir George Lewis) would inquire into it.

COLONEL NORTH observed, that the officers of the First Bengal Fusiliers, and the whole of the Artillery, had not yet received the medal for Delhi, which was captured five years ago.

Vote agreed to.

(7.) £213,177, Administration of the Army.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY asked for an explanation of the rule on which the Government acted towards officers of the Staff. Those officers were said to hold their offices for five years only; but several exceptions to that had been made in favour of particular officers at home. He wished to know whether these matters were regulated upon any fixed principle; and, if so, what was that principle? There were three officers now holding high offices in the administration of the army to whose appointment it was distinctly understood the rule would be applied.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the rule was as the hon. Baronet had stated. One of the three officers to whom, he supposed, reference was now made was the Commander-in-Chief. Was that not so? [SIR JOHN TRELAWNY: Yes.] Well, he had never understood that that was an appointment which should come within the rule of being tenable only for five years. He thought it quite unreasonable and contrary to the spirit of the rule that it should be applied to his Royal Highness. The other two officers also holding situations at the Horse Guards had held their offices a sufficient time to contravene the rule. They came, strictly speaking, within the rule.

COLONEL NORTH observed, that it was always understood that the Secretary of State for War had the power, and would exercise it, of continuing those officers so long as he deemed necessary for the public service.

MR. W. WILLIAMS noticed several items in this Vote which had never appeared before. For instance, there was allowance for forage to the Commander-in-Chief, £976. This was the forage for forty horses. His Secretary also received £244 forage money. On referring to former Estimates he found that neither Lord Hill, the Duke of Wellington, nor Lord Hard-inge had such allowances, which, he held, were altogether preposterous.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the same allowance had been made to the Commander-in-Chief last year.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he would certainly take the sense of the Committee on the Vote, although he was sorry to do so, from the high respect he entertained for his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge.

COLONEL NORTH pointed to the fact that the Estimate last year was £4,432, which included this allowance, the sum being identical with that to be voted this year, with the exception of £9 9s. 6d. for an additional day in leap-year. Every officer in the army was allowed forage.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS assured his hon. Friend that there was nothing new in this Vote. His Royal Highness had precisely the same allowance for forage last year as the Estimate proposed to allow this year. The Estimates were made out with greater detail this year, but the pay and allowances for forage amounted together to the same sum as last year.

MR. W. WILLIAMS had referred to the Estimates for the last five years, and found no such charge for forage.

GENERAL LINDSAY asked, if it was not the fact that the Commander-in-Chief, although made recently a Field Marshal, received exactly the same pay as before, and that the allowance for forage appeared in previous Estimates under another head, while this year it was included under this Vote in order to bring the whole more clearly before the Committee.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that statement was quite correct. All officers of a certain rank received a certain amount of forage. When the Duke of Cambridge was made Field Marshal he would, according to the regular scale, have been entitled to higher pay and allowances; but he understood and agreed to the arrangement that he should not claim any additional pay or allowances, but only receive the increased rank of Field Marshal. His Royal Highness received identically the same allowances that were enjoyed by his predecessors in office.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY called attention again to the rule which laid it down that Staff officers should be changed every five years. He referred to the questions which had been asked upon the subject of re-appointments by the hon. Member for King's County (Colonel Dunne) on the Military Committee, which recommended the change of system; and unless he received some more satisfactory explanations with regard to certain exceptions to the rule than had been given by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, he should move a reduction of the Vote by £5,569, being the salaries of certain Staff officers who had been re-appointed after five years' service contrary to the recommendations of the Committee.

Colonel Dunne

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he thought he had given a very distinct answer to the question already. He had said, and would again say, that he never understood the rule to be applicable to the office of Commander-in-Chief. The offices of Quartermaster and Adjutant General came strictly within the rule, but it was, in his opinion, competent to the Commander-in-Chief, with the consent of the Secretary of State for War, to abstain for a limited time from enforcing the rule in extraordinary and important cases. He could only say he considered himself answerable for the discretion that had been exercised in the cases referred to, and that he was perfectly justified in the re-appointments.

LORD HOTHAM considered that the recommendation which had been made by one of the Military Committees, and adopted by Lord Herbert, was most unwise with regard to the officers in question. It was much to be regretted that the proposition should have been laid down so broadly, that all Staff officers should be changed every five years. There were two offices especially in which a change every five years would be fatal to their efficiency. He did not know whether the Military Secretary was included in the rule; but, to be efficient, the Military Secretary should know every officer in the army, and that was a thing which would require great experience. If they were to change the Secretary every five years, what chance would the Commander-in-Chief have of doing justice to the army? for it was upon the information which the Military Secretary gave him he had to rely. Then as to the Adjutant General; he might be called the court of appeal of the army, and ought to have served in every part of the world, so as to know the duties to be performed in every station in which a part of the army might be placed. If he were changed every five years, he would not know his business. He, for one, thought that the Secretary for War had exercised a most wise discretion in the course which he had taken in this matter; and if he wished for good and efficient officers in the situations just alluded to, he would disregard the recommendations of the Committee; for so long as he found an officer efficient, he would do good to the whole army by continuing him in his post.

COLONEL DUNNE quite agreed with the noble Lord who had just spoken that, with respect to the Staff at headquarters, it would be most injurious to lay down any such rule. But the object which he had in view when on the Military Committee was to prevent the evasion of the rule by the transfer of officers from one staff to another.

Vote agreed to.

The following Votes were also agreed to:—

(8.) £25,933, Rewards for Military Service.

(9.) £77,782, Pay of General Officers.

(10.) £464,895, Pay of Reduced and Retired Officers.

(11.) £172,157, Widows' Pensions and Compassionate Allowances.

(12.) £32,843, Pensions and Allowances to Wounded Officers.

(13.) 33,776, In-Pensioners of Chelsea and Kilmmainham Hospitals.

(14.) £1,142,702, Out-Pensioners of Chelsea Hospital.

(15.) £144,964, Superannuation Allowances, &c.

COLONEL DUNNE wished to know whether any decision had been come to with respect to the superannuation of barrack-masters. He trusted there would be no civil appointments to this office in future.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, barrack-masters were not soldiers. [Colonel DUNNE: They ought to be.] Whether it was desirable to appoint old soldiers or not was another question. As civil officers, however, they came under the rules of Civil Service Superannuation.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that if soldiers were appointed barrack-masters at forty, fifty, or sixty years of age, they had very little chance of superannuation under the Civil Service regulations.

Vote agreed to; as was also—

(16.) £32,786, Disembodied Militia.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow. Committee to sit again on Wednesday.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Resolutions (March 20) reported.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, that the Secretary of State for War was understood, on the Vote for the Volunteer Force, to say that there were only 40,000 bayonets in the country for its defence. [Sir GEORGE LEWIS: Of the regular army.] He was glad to hear the correction, because he had met officers belonging to the militia who regarded the statement as a slur upon that branch of the service. There were 95,000 militia of all ranks who were supposed to be trained.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS was quite certain he had added the words of "the regular army" to the statement in question. What he said was that there were only forty battalions of the regular army in the country. He might have added the Yeomanry if he had been recapitulating the force available for the defence of the country.

MARINE MUTINY BILL.—COMMITTEE.

(Progress 20th March.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 28 (Power to inflict Corporal Punishment).

MR. WHITE said, he would not recapitulate his objections to this clause, but would move that it be expunged.

Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided: — Ayes 86; Noes 31: Majority 55.

Clause agreed to.Clauses 29 to 38, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 39 (Marking Deserters).

MR. COX moved the omission of the clause. He considered branding even a worse mode of punishment than flogging.

Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided: — Ayes 97; Noes 22: Majority 75.

Clause agreed to.House resumed.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read 3^d To-morrow.

TOBACCO DUTIES BILL.—[BILL 66.]

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the Amendments which he proposed were purely verbal, with one exception, namely, that when tobacco was warehoused for ships' stores, the drawback should be paid on admission to the warehouse, and not upon export.

Amendments agreed to.

Bill to be read 3^d To-morrow, at half past Four of the clock.

TELEGRAPHS BILL.—[BILL 57.]

COMMITTEE.

(Progress 19th March.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 6 agreed to.

Clause 7 (For Underground Works in Metropolis and Large Towns Consent of Street Authority requisite).

MR. BLACKBURN moved an Amendment, the effect of which was to limit the power of telegraph companies to take up any road without the consent of the authorities in trust of that road.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 39, after the word "street," to insert the words "or public road."

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, the Committee should remember that they were not now conferring powers; they were merely regulating the exercise of powers already conferred. This Bill was analogous to those Acts which contained general clauses to be embodied hereafter into special Acts. If the assent of every public body having power over the roads was to be necessary before those roads could be touched, there would be no need to come to Parliament at all. The object of coming to Parliament was to obtain special powers to execute certain works without the assent of the parties interested. Parliament had already granted these powers, and the Committee were now asked to apply to the exercise of those powers such regulations as they thought desirable. It would not be expedient that it should rest with some small board in the country to determine whether a line of telegraphs should be laid down between, say, London and Liverpool; what was desired was that care should be properly protected in laying down wires.

MR. HENLEY wanted to know why the same regulations that applied to works above ground should not apply also to works under ground. He did not think that small corporate towns, or trustees of turnpike roads more than thirty miles long, should have a right to stop important lines of telegraph. He thought, therefore, that there ought to be an appeal to the Board of Trade.

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL said, the different telegraph companies were all subject to stringent restrictions of one kind or another. Unless it could be shown that they had greatly abused their powers, it was unjust to add further limitations.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, if Parliament were to impose arbitrary conditions of a nature not at present known to the law upon companies hereafter to be formed, the effect would be to give a practical monopoly to telegraph companies already in existence. It was not impossible that in the present instance, as sometimes happened before Railway Committees, vested interests might be seeking to protect themselves by affecting zeal for the public welfare.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he neither held a share in a telegraph company himself, nor did any friend or relation of his hold a share; but he thought the proposed clause did extend to existing companies. As far as the clause itself was concerned, it either went too far or not far enough. Either the companies should have power to go where they pleased, or the rights of the road trustees should not be limited in any part of the country.

MR. HENLEY could not understand why, if this were a Bill to remedy inconveniences admittedly felt under the present system, the right hon. Gentleman should shrink from endeavouring to guard against evils of a practical character.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY complained of the roving commission apparently enjoyed by the telegraph companies. In the town of Preston, where he had some property, persons purchasing and intending to build upon land found the company's workmen putting up poles exactly in front of their drawing room windows. No notice whatever had been given of their proceedings. If Parliament had given improper powers to the companies, those powers ought to be properly regulated; if they had been surreptitiously obtained, they ought to be restrained. As the existing powers were so obnoxious and unfair, he trusted they would not be extended to new companies.

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL said, it was not the fact that the powers which had been conferred upon the telegraph companies last year had been surreptitiously obtained.

LORD HOTHAM said, there was no doubt that some of the powers conferred upon the companies were excessive and unwarranted. It was obvious that with the forty-eight hours' notice now permitted by Parliament, it was only necessary for the promoters of the telegraph to watch a man away from his home on a visit, and when he came back he might find the posts stuck up in front of his house. Some years ago he had the honour of being chairman of a Telegraph Committee. The Committee granted the line, which was at that time opposed. Another Committee sat in the following year, and the powers then granted were greatly enlarged. A year or two passed, and a friend of his asked how the Committee over which he presided could have given such powers; and it turned out that the succeeding Committee had granted these powers on the understanding that they had been sanctioned by his (Lord Hotham's) Committee. Upon investigation, however, it turned out that this was a total mistake. The very reverse was the fact. He (Lord Hotham) represented the circumstances to the then Vice President of the Board of Trade; but the matter could not be remedied. After that he felt justified in saying he should not be very delicate in dealing with the powers of these companies.

MR. REMINGTON MILLS said, that nothing was further from the fact than that the powers granted by the Bill which was approved by the Committee of which he was a Member had been unfairly obtained.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 45; Noes 67: Majority 22.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 (Depth, Course, &c. of Underground Works to be agreed on between Street or Road Authority and Company, or else to be determined by Justices or Sheriff).

MR. DALGLISH moved the insertion in the 13th line of the word "twenty-eight" for the word "fourteen," his object being that the former instead of the latter number of days should constitute the term of the notice to be given to trustees and public bodies generally when it was proposed that a telegraphic wire should be run through the properties under their control at a particular level.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he thought fourteen days' notice would be amply sufficient, inasmuch as the question whether a telegraphic wire under ground should run one inch above or one below a certain level was one of so little importance that it would, in the majority of cases, be decided by the surveyors of public bodies without there being any necessity of assembling the bodies themselves to pronounce a judgment upon it. He had acted on the best information which he could obtain; but if hon. Gentlemen thought that fourteen days' notice was too short, he would accept the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 9 agreed to.

Clause 10 (No Telegraph over Streets, except above Houses, and with Consent of Street Authority).

MR. HENLEY asked how it was proposed that the expenses of references to the Board of Trade were to be paid. Were the parties to come to London, or was a Special Commissioner to be sent to the spot? Both would be very expensive processes, and the Committee ought to understand from what funds the cost would be defrayed.

MR. MILNER GIBSON referred the right hon. Gentleman to the 24th and 25th clauses.

MR. HENLEY saw plenty of provision for the payment of the officials of the Board of Trade, but was there any provision for the payment of innocent parties who might be put to a great deal of trouble?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that if the right hon. Gentleman would allow the question to stand over, he would consider it.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 11 and 12 were also agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Thursday.

VACCINATION (IRELAND) BILL.

[BILL 70.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR ROBERT PEEL, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, it was intended to supply the defects of various other Bills which had been passed within the last thirteen years. Within the last few years there had been a great falling off in the number of children vaccinated in Ireland, and he proposed to assimilate the law in Ireland to that in England, employing for the purpose the machinery of the Registration of Births and Deaths Bill, which had recently passed through the House. England was not the only country in which vaccination was compulsory, for in most countries of Europe there was a compulsory system. From the Census Returns he found that no fewer than 50,000 persons had died of small pox in Ireland since 1841; and in 1860 there was a diminution of 33,000 in the number of vaccination cases as compared with those of the previous year. The cost of the proposed measure would be very trifling. The Registrars of Births and Deaths would also act as Registrars of Vaccination. The Treasury would bear the expense of the books, but in cases in which the registrar himself was not the vaccinator he was to be allowed a fee of 3d. for making the registry. Under an existing Act dispensing doctors were allowed about a shilling a head for each child they vaccinated. There were about 200,000 children born in Ireland each year, and it was calculated that, of these, three-fourths, or 140,000, would receive gratuitous vaccination. The total expense imposed on each of the Poor Law unions (of which there were 163) by the Bill which he now proposed would be about £3 16s. 8d.—a mere trifle compared with the benefits which it would confer on the country. He begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

SIR EDWARD GROGAN thought, considering the Bill had been so short a time in the hands of Members, it ought to be postponed till the opinion of the people of Ireland on its provisions could be obtained by their representatives.

MR. BAGWELL said, this was the third Bill on the subject which had been introduced within a very few years, and he thought it was quite unnecessary.

COLONEL DUNNE believed the measure would mischievously disturb the existing arrangements. He moved the adjournment of the debate.

SIR ROBERT PEEL appealed to the hon. and gallant Member to allow them to proceed. The measure would be of great benefit to the poor of Ireland. The burden imposed by the Bill would be only 1-21 of a farthing in the pound on the total valuation roll of Ireland.

Mr. Milner Gibson

LORD NAAS said, the expense of the measure was not the most serious objection to it. To attach a legal penalty to non-vaccination would tend to make that very important and necessary operation exceedingly unpopular. Moreover, the Act of 1858 had not yet had a fair trial. All that was wanted at present was, that the Poor Law Commissioners should take care that the dispensary doctors did their duty.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 16; Noes 37: Majority 21.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. WHITESIDE said, when the right hon. Gentleman brought forward a Bill of a novel character at one in the morning he must expect to see it opposed. He thought there ought to be time for further consideration. He moved that the House do now adjourn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON thought it not courteous to the Irish people to bring in a Bill on the Friday and read it a second time on the Monday.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

Debate arising; Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

House adjourned at a quarter after One o'clock

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, March 24, 1863.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Mutiny; Tobacco Duties (No. 56).

Second Reading—Post Office Savings Banks (No. 47).

Committee—Births and Deaths (Ireland) Registration (No. 30).

Report—Illegitimate Children (Ireland) (No. 57).

Third Reading—Salmon Exportation (No. 51); Consolidated Fund (£10,000,000) (No. 46).

POLISH REFUGEES IN PRUSSIA.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said,
VOL. CLXIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

that seeing the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in his place, he wished to ask him, Whether Her Majesty's Government had received information as to certain Poles having been seized in Prussia and handed over by the Prussian Government to the Russian authorities. He had himself heard that a report to that effect was quite true; and he had also heard, in another instance, that some Poles, arrested in the Prussian territory, had been handed over to the Russian police, and subsequently shot. He wished to know whether Her Majesty's Government had received any information upon the subject?

EARL RUSSELL replied, that the only information received by him was a despatch from Sir Andrew Buchanan, to the effect that two Polish students had been arrested in Prussia, and that a demand had been made by the Russian authorities that they should be handed over to them. The French Ambassador, however, had claimed those two young men on the ground that they were naturalized subjects of France, and Sir Andrew Buchanan expressed a hope that they would not be given up to the Russians. That was the only account he had received with reference to the arrest of Poles in Prussia.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: Then the noble Earl has not heard of any case in which Poles arrested in Prussia and handed over to Russian authorities, have been shot?

EARL RUSSELL: I have received no account to that effect.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS REGISTRATION (IRELAND) BILL—(No. 30.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE presented Petitions from Boards of Guardians in Ireland, praying that the expenses of carrying out the provisions of the measure be defrayed out of the Imperial funds; and from the President and Fellows of the King and Queen's College of Physicians (Ireland), objecting to certain provisions of the Bill, and complaining that the Returns required to be made would not show the sanatory condition of the population in the various towns. The learned body from whom this Petition emanated did not think it was right that the medical men whose duty it would be, as registrars, to make the Returns should be placed in a position inferior to clerks of unions. After reading the petitions and examining the various clauses of the Bill, he must say, that if it were intended to take effect as a sanatory measure, its provisions were utterly inadequate. If it were designed with such an object, it would be necessary that the Returns should be made by gentlemen of professional attainments; while, on the other hand, if they merely contained a bald statement of the number of deaths in each town, they would be of little use for sanatory purposes. When he first read the Bill, he did not think it had any sanatory object, and if it was looked to to give the Government of Ireland sanatory information it would entirely fail. He thought it would be better to expunge those clauses relating to sanatory regulations, and postpone the consideration of the Bill in Committee till after Easter.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMAN'S said, he should be prepared to discuss the different points the noble Marquess had referred to in Committee on the Bill.

THE EARL OF BANDON said, he entirely agreed with the noble Marquess that a delay of a few weeks was desirable, with a view to the further consideration of this measure; and he thought that delay the more desirable seeing that there were scarcely any Irish Peers then in the House. In the Bill of last year, the expense of registration was to be charged upon the Grand Jury cess and not upon the poor rate; in this Bill it was made to fall upon the poor rate. It was a known fact that so long as the poor rate was confined to the relief of the poor they gave a stimulus to the ratepayers to keep it down; but that if they added other charges, that stimulus was removed. His opinion certainly was that the charge for the registrars should be on the Consolidated Fund. He entertained a very strong opinion that it would have been a far wiser course for the Government to introduce a Bill to settle the whole question of births, deaths, and marriages in Ireland. A Committee was appointed in the House of Commons to which all the Bills on the subject were referred, and they reported as to the registration of marriages; but the Government had not legislated on that point, and had done so on those on which the Committee did not report. He thought there was nothing so easy to deal with as this question of the registration of marriages; and since this Bill had passed through the other House two or three measures had been proposed on the subject, and all parties seemed to agree that legislation should take place with reference to it. He therefore suggested that this measure should be postponed for the present, with a view to their dealing with the registration of births, deaths, and marriages altogether.

The Marquess of Clanricarde

THE EARL OF LEITRIM was understood to dissent from some of the provisions of the Bill, and to urge that its consideration in Committee should be postponed for a short time.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 to 21, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 22 (Appointment of Superintendent Registrar).

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE trusted the Government would have no objection to alter the title of the clerks of unions, who in this clause were called "superintendent registrars," to "clerks of registrars."

THE EARL OF ST. GERMAN'S opposed the Amendment. He thought it as well to have the same machinery in Ireland as in England.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE would be contented with the omission of the word "registrar," and the insertion of the words "of registries" in lieu thereof.

On Question, Whether the words proposed to be omitted shall stand Part of the Clause? their Lordships divided:—Contents 32; Not-Contents 5: Majority 27.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

CONTENTS.

Newcastle, D.	Sydney, V.
Somerset, D.
Camden, M.	Cranworth, L.
	Crewe, L.
Airlie, E.	Dartrey, L. (L. Cremorne).
Albemarle, E.	Foley, L. [Teller .]
Caithness, E.	Harris, L.
Camperdown, E.	Hunsdon, L. (V. Falkland).
Cathcart, E.	Llanover, L.
De Grey, E.	Lyveden, L.
Devon, E.	Overstone, L.
Ducie, E.	Ponsonby, L. (E. Beaumont). [Teller .]
Ellenborough, E.	Redecliffe, L.
Granville, E.	Stanley of Alderley, L.
Grey, E.	Sundridge, L. (D. Argyll).
Russell, E.	Wodehouse, L.
St. Germans, E.
Everaley, V.

NOT-CONTENTS.

Bandon, E.	Clements, L. (E. Leitrim).
Belmore, E. [Teller .]	Somerhill, L. (M. Clanricarde). [Teller .]
Hawarden, V.

Another Amendment moved, and negatived.

Amendments made: The Report thereof to be received on Thursday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 57.)

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK BILL.

(NO. 47.) SECOND READING.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

LORD REDESDALE said, he thought that the interests of the infant depositors were not sufficiently protected by the Act. As it stood at present, the deposits of children over seven years of age could be transferred from the old savings banks to the Post Office savings banks, and afterwards withdrawn by their parents and guardians. He thought, that considering the class of persons who would make use of these banks, there would often be a disposition on the part of the parent or guardian to withdraw the money of the child, rather than allow it to accumulate.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that the transfer of such monies must be made with the consent of the Postmaster General and two trustees of the old savings banks. He did not therefore think that the objection of the noble Lord was of any force; but the subject could be considered in Committee.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

THE INDIAN COUNCIL.

QUESTION.

LORD LYVEDEN rose to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether they intend in this Session to reconsider so much of the Act 21 & 22 Vict., c. 106, as relates to the Nomination, Election, Numbers, Duration of Service, Salaries, and Retired Allowances of the Councillors of India? In the Bills which were introduced by the Government of the Earl of Derby and Lord Palmerston, at the time the Government of India was transferred from the East India Company to the Crown, the numbers of the proposed Council differed in each Bill. Six was the number at first proposed by himself to the Cabinet to which he had the honour to belong, who altered it to eight, and it was raised by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Ellenborough) to fifteen, its present number. Many objections were raised to the duration of the office; and Motions were made in both Houses to limit the duration to five years; and, altogether, there were great doubts and differences of opinion as to the details of the Bill. Lord Stanley then stated that it was unnecessary to introduce clauses of that nature into the Bill; because the Legislature might, at any moment they pleased, alter the constitution of the Council. After they had had a few years' practical experience of the working of the Council, it was generally felt it would be necessary to revise its constitution altogether. From the time, however, of the passing of the Act, Parliament had been kept perfectly in the dark as to what the Council was doing. One paper, certainly, had been laid on the table, and a very remarkable one it was. It related to the amalgamation of the Indian with the Queen's army—a question on which every one would have supposed that the Indian Council would have been able to give excellent advice. But the Secretary of State (Sir Charles Wood) would not allow them to express an opinion upon it until the matter had been finally decided by the Cabinet. Some of them wished to protest; but the right hon. Baronet pointed out to them that the Act only allowed them to protest in matters which had been decided at one of their meetings, whereas this matter had been decided by the Cabinet before the Council met. However, as a matter of good nature, he allowed those who desired it to enter a useless dissent. The Council, too, would have been very well qualified to arrange the details of the manner in which this measure should be carried out; but the Secretary of State, instead of employing them, had recourse to that last expedient of a Minister at his wits' end—a Royal Commission. As to the amount of work in the Council, he knew from his own official experience, that under the old Board of Directors despatches were read and answered by clerks. Abstracts were made for the Directors; but the principal part of the writing was mere clerical labour. In reply to his demand to have the number of Councillors reduced, the names of distinguished men would no doubt be mentioned. It would be said that Sir John Lawrence was one of the Councillors. That was true; but they did not want fifteen Sir John Lawrences, even if they could find them. Six or eight Councillors, the number proposed by Lord Palmerston's Government in the first instance, would be quite sufficient. He said this with the greatest respect for the gentlemen who at present composed the Council. With some of these he was personally acquainted, and he knew that they were all men of business habits and high character; but if even £10,000 a year could be saved by reducing the number, it would be worth while to study economy in the matter. He therefore begged to ask whether Her Majesty's Government intended to submit the question of the number of Councillors to a Committee—which might be a useful course—or whether they intended to bring in such a Bill as might be introduced under the proviso in the Act 22 & 23 Vict., c. 106, which stated that the arrangement made by that Act should stand till "Parliament shall otherwise provide."

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he could not help thinking that his noble Friend had addressed this question to Her Majesty's Government rather for the purpose of expressing to the House his own opinion on a very important subject than for that of obtaining from the Government an answer, the substance of which he must be able to anticipate; because his noble Friend must feel, that if it was the intention of the Government to revise and alter the decision which had been deliberately come to by Parliament respecting the nature, tenure, and composition of the Indian Council, it would have been their duty to come down and make an announcement to that effect, and not withhold the information till such time as it might incidentally be elicited in answer to a question from a noble Lord. His noble Friend must be aware that the answer he had to give him on the part of Her Majesty's Government was, that there was no intention at that moment, or at any future time, as far as they could at present speak for the future, to revise and alter the decision come to after much deliberation and by large majorities, when the India Bill was under discussion in 1858. During the debates on that measure the question was raised by a distinguished Member of the House of Commons (Mr. Roebuck) whether it was necessary for the Secretary of State for India to have any Council at all—whether India might not be governed by a Secretary, assisted by an Under Secretary, and some officials acquainted with India. Mr. Roebuck raised that question; but it was not pushed to a division. He (the Duke of Argyll) was not prepared to state that India might not be governed in that way if men acquainted with the country, and of ability and experience, could be got to serve under the Secretary of State in the subordinate position of ordinary officials. But this objection was taken by Parliament, and he thought it was a fatal one—that we should not be able to induce men who had distinguished themselves in India to assist the Secretary under such circumstances. He very much doubted that we could have got such men as Sir John Lawrence, Sir Frederick Currie, and Mr. Willoughby under that arrangement. The next question was, as to the number of Councillors. He confessed he did not believe the weight of the Indian Council depended on its number. He believed it depended on the character of the Councillors, more than on their number. Although there were some expressions of opinion in favour of a Council of twelve, it was ultimately decided by a large majority, with the assent of Lord Stanley, that the number should be fifteen. Another question which was discussed was, whether any portion of the Council should be elective, or whether they should all be nominated by the Crown. A new constituency was devised for the purpose of carrying out the elective principle; but the proposal was rejected. He would not pronounce any opinion upon the wisdom of that scheme; but this, at all events, might be said in favour of it, that it provided that in the new constituency the interests of the commercial classes should be represented. The only principle of importance in election was the principle of representation, and that was entirely abandoned; because, although the proposal was adopted that seven out of fifteen Councillors should be nominated by the Council itself, Lord Stanley very fairly admitted at the time that it had nothing to do with the principle of election, and was merely a means of introducing some few persons who would not be selected by the Secretary of State. These successive decisions by Parliament, in divisions which were not influenced by party feeling, ought to be accepted by the Government as settling the question of the constitution of the Council, unless and until some evil was discovered which it was their duty to remedy. He entirely disputed the proposition that any pledge was given by which they were bound, within a certain number of years, to consider the question again of an organic change in the Indian Council, and he maintained that no change ought be suggested which might lessen the reputation and authority of the Council. In his opinion, nothing had occurred since the passing of the measure to cast a doubt upon the practical working of the system. The Council had, upon the whole, worked smoothly and satisfactorily; and the absence of papers, of which the noble Lord complained, was a proof that occasions did not arise for the Council to record protests and dissents in reference to decisions of the Secretary of State. Some papers, showing what was doing in the Council, had been produced. The amalgamation of the two armies was not an Indian but an Imperial question, and the opinions of some of the most eminent Members were laid before Parliament previous to Parliament being asked to come to a decision upon it. He could not conceive a more important question than the redemption of the land tax and the permanent settlement of the land revenue of India. That question had been discussed and decided in the Indian Council, and valuable papers had been presented to Parliament in which the opinions of the most distinguished Members with regard to it might be read. Another important question, as to the relations between the European planters and the ryots of India, had also been decided, and the opinions of members of Council, eminent for their knowledge of the country, and of Indian affairs, had been made known. In both those instances, the Secretary of State had overruled the decision of the Governor General and his Council, and it was most important to the Secretary of State that he should be able to point to those papers, to show that he had not acted without full consultation and the full support of those eminent and distinguished men. The local Government must sometimes be influenced by local opinion, and local opinion in India was mainly the opinion of the English settlers and the English commercial classes. He had no doubt that upon the question of the relations between the planters and ryots the local Government had committed a material error; and he was equally sure that the power of the Secretary of State to correct that error was greatly strengthened by his being able to appeal to the opinions of men of equal eminence with the Councillors of the Governor General and free from the vices under which the Legislature of Calcutta more or less conducted its proceedings. In both these cases, of the relations between the planters and the ryots and the settlement of the land revenue, it was satisfactory to see the opinion of competent men sustaining the opinion of the Secretary of State, and he sincerely believed that the present Council was composed of a body of gentlemen, whose opinions might fairly be trusted in all questions of a similar kind.

Lord Lyveden

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he entirely approved of the course which the noble Duke had announced on the part of the Government, namely, that of deprecating any disturbance in the constitution of the Council. He thought it extremely fortunate that the noble Duke had had the opportunity to make that declaration, which would strengthen the Council and give stability to its judgments. He (the Earl of Ellenborough) had always been in favour of a Council, and the stronger the better, as he thought it was always an advantage for the Secretary of State, when he introduced a measure, to be able to tell Parliament that he was supported by the concurrence of his Council. He believed there would always be occasions when the opinions of the Members of the Council would clash, because there were always questions which required to be treated in a cautious and deliberate manner. He confessed that he should never be afraid of a strong Council; but he should have the greatest apprehension of a weak one; for the Indian Minister might be able to manage able men, but might not be able to manage weak men.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, it was the unanimous opinion of the country that the Council did, on the whole, work well; but it might, nevertheless, be a legitimate subject of inquiry whether, even if they should not proceed to an immediate reduction, there might not be a possibility of future reduction, not only without a diminution, but even with an increase of efficiency. His own idea was, that the Council would work better if it were not quite so numerous. The noble Lord, however, had given no indication of the kind of change he contemplated in the Council. But what he complained of, and what his noble Friend complained of, was that Parliament did not know how the Council worked. He thought that great advantage would result from the publication of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Council, because at present they were utterly in the dark as to when the Secretary of State was opposed or supported, and by whom. It was all very well for the Secretary of State for India to say, "I am supported by Sir John Lawrence and such and such other distinguished men;" but their Lordships did not know whether, or on what points, and how far, he was supported by them. On one most important question the opinion of the Council was not known until the decision of the Government had been taken. If the Secretary of State could appeal to the authority of his Council in support of his views, it was right that Parliament should know when he did so, whether the Council were unanimous, and what were the opinions of individual Members. Without such knowledge, Parliament came to the discussion of questions relating to the Government of India at great disadvantage.

EARL GREY said, that the fact of their knowing very little about the Council was to his mind the best possible proof that it was working tolerably smoothly and well. If difficulties arose, and the Council were unable to conduct the affairs of India in concert with the Secretary of State, he had no doubt Parliament would hear of it soon enough. When they found things working well, he certainly did not wish to see changes introduced.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, what he objected to was that the authority of the Council should be quoted without giving Parliament an opportunity of seeing how far the Members of Council were unanimous.

NEW SOUTH WALES, VICTORIA, AND SOUTH AUSTRALIA.—PETITIONS.

EARL GREY presented Petitions of Inhabitants of the District of Clarence and Richmond Rivers for the Separation of the District of the Clarence and Richmond Rivers from the Colony of New South Wales, and for including the same in the Colony of Queensland; and of Inhabitants of Bridgewater, Portland, and Heywood, in the Western District of the Colony of Victoria, for Separation of Western Portion of Victoria from Victoria, and of the South Eastern District of South Australia from South Australia, and for the Union of these into One separate Colony. The noble Earl said, that in the Act of 1850, for the better Government of the Australian Colonies, power was reserved to the Crown to detach portions of the colony of New South Wales in order to form other colonies if necessary, and to alter the boundaries of the several Colonies from time to time. In the year 1859 that power was acted upon, and the colony of Queensland founded; but, instead of following the course contemplated when the Act was passed, different boundaries were chosen. The Petitioners in the first Petition, which was from the district of the Clarence and Richmond Rivers, complained that, in consequence of the boundary of the Colony of New South Wales being fixed at the 28th instead of the 30th parallel of south latitude, they had been separated from Queensland, the colony with which they were naturally connected, and remained attached to the colony of New South Wales, from which they were divided by a range of mountainous country. They were 500 miles from Sydney, the capital of New South Wales, from which they were also separated by this natural boundary, and only 100 miles from Brisbane, the capital of Queensland, and they stated that they had no material interests in common with New South Wales. They therefore contended that they ought to be separated from the former and attached to the latter colony. They complained, moreover, that they were unfairly dealt with in the matter of taxation, having been made liable in part for a public debt with which practically they had no concern; that they were not fairly dealt with in the appropriation of the revenue, not having a fair proportion of the advantage in proportion to the revenue they paid; besides which, they had no hope of good government until they were attached to Queensland, with which they were connected geographically and by inclination. Upon those grounds they prayed that such steps might be taken as might seem proper to annex them to Queensland. It appeared to him that the complaint of these petitioners was just, and that the district in question ought to belong to Queensland rather than to New South Wales. There were three other Petitions—from Portland, Bridgewater, and a third district in the western portion of the colony of Victoria. They complained of their distance from the seat of Government, and alleged that they were subjected to legislation unsuited to their circumstances. The same prayer proceeded from the districts forming the eastern portion of the colony of South Australia, who were circumstanced in regard to South Australia as were the other petitioners in regard to Victoria, and who therefore prayed that they might be formed into a distinct colony. They stated that they were together quite large enough for this purpose, and that they were larger than the colony of Port Phillip when it was separated from New South Wales. He was not so well acquainted with the merits of this Petition as of the other, but all these representations were well deserving of the attention of the Government and of Parliament.

The Marquess of Clanricarde

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, that the letters patent constituting the colony of Queensland were issued by his predecessor in the early part of 1859, and he could not explain the reasons which influenced him in adopting the line of division he had made. Some time after his acceptance of office he received an application, not from the colonists, but from their representative in this country, urging that the particular district referred to in the Petition should be added to Queensland; and another series of applications asking that it should be retained by New South Wales. To these applications he replied, that as the boundary lines had been laid down by letters patent, it was beyond his power to interfere; he said, however, that if they could come to any agreement between themselves as to any other line of boundary, he should be willing to adjust their differences. Since then he had had no communication on the subject, and he had hoped that they had acquiesced in the arrangement which had been made. With reference to the formation of a new colony from fragments of Victoria and South Australia, he could assure his noble Friend that applications for the formation of new colonies out of the existing Australian colonies came so frequently, that if it were possible to accomplish the wishes of all the people of New South Wales, Sydney and a very limited district around it would be the only surviving portion of the colony of New South Wales. The settlers in many districts averred that they would be better off if separated from the mother colony; and he considered that it would be exceedingly bad policy to multiply colonies in Australia to an indefinite extent, especially until certain districts were thoroughly populated. Of course, the expenses of new Governments would be large, and all the difficulties which existed, with reference to customs duties, between the different colonies would be greatly magnified. In short, his opinion was, that generally speaking, until a portion of a colony was completely populated, it would be very unadvisable to interfere. There were applications, no doubt, that must shortly be attended to. He had been recently appealed to, for instance, to form a new colony south of the Gulf of Carpentaria. The time had not yet arrived for such a step; but the progress of exploration and the vast influx of people into that pastoral district would justify, before long, the establishment of one, if not two, additional colonies—one at Victoria River, and perhaps another at Albert River. For the present, however, deprecating these constant applications for separation, he had decided on this provisional arrangement:—that the large district extending between the Gulf of Carpentaria and Port Essington, and including an area of 730,000 square miles, should be temporarily annexed, one portion to Queensland and another to South Australia. He thought it would be undesirable to sever the other districts alluded to by his noble Friend unless more valid reasons than any he had yet heard could be assigned.

Petitions to lie on the table.

MUTINY BILL.

Read 1st; and to be read 2^d on Thursday next: (The Earl De Grey.)

TOBACCO DUTIES BILL.

Read 1st; to be printed; and to be read 2^d on Thursday next; and Standing Orders No. 37 and 38 to be considered in order to their being dispensed with; and the Lords Summoned: (The Lord President.) (No. 56).

House adjourned at a half past Seven o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, March 24, 1863.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—Resolutions (March 23) reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Militia Pay.

Second Reading—Partnership Law Amendment [Bill 26]; Vaccination (Ireland), Debate (March 23) further adjourned.

Committee—Inclosure [Bill 58].

Report—Inclosure [Bill 58].

Considered as amended—Corrupt Practices at Elections [Bill 68].

Third Reading—Tobacco Duties [Bill 66], and passed; Marine Mutiny, and passed.

ABOLITION OF TURNPIKES.

QUESTION.

MR. WESTERN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is his intention this Session to introduce any measure for abolishing Turnpikes ; and, if not, whether he will be disposed to leave out of the Continuation Act those trusts which are free from debt ?

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, in reply, that it was not the intention of the Government to introduce any general measure for the abolition of turnpikes. It was undoubtedly the custom to extinguish trusts whenever the debt had been paid off, but there were some exceptions, however, to that rule. With regard to the case which the hon. Member had doubtless in his mind, that of the Essex roads, the trustees, and a majority of the parishes through which the highways passed, were of opinion that the trust should be continued. Under these circumstances, it would not be extinguished.

ALIENATION OF BRITISH TERRITORY. QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he wished to ask Mr. Solicitor General, Whether it is within the competence of the Prerogative of the Crown, upon the advice of the Minister of the day, to alienate any undoubted territorial possession of the Crown or the country without the knowledge or consent of Parliament ; and, if so, whether such exercise of the Prerogative is not, in fact, equivalent to the possession by the Government of an arbitrary power of such alienation of territory ?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL : Sir, the hon. Member put the same Question to the noble Lord at the head of the Government not long ago. If the noble Lord had not answered the hon. Gentleman, I do not know that it would have been quite consistent with my duty to do so. Since the noble Lord did answer the Question, I may repeat the substance of his reply, without going into the argument involved in the question. There is neither law nor constitutional usage to make the assent of Parliament necessary to the cession of territories of the Crown unless the laws of this country have been introduced into those territories, or unless Parliament has legislated concerning them.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he wished to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman to explain the exact qualification he had introduced into his answer. The hon. and learned Gentleman said it was competent to alienate territory of the Crown without the assent of Parliament unless English laws had been introduced into the territory, or that it had been legislated for in Parliament. He wished, for example, to know whether the Crown possessed the Prerogative of ceding Colonies like Canada, Malta, or Gibraltar without the assent of Parliament ?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL : I really cannot argue the question with the hon. Member. When British subjects have settled in newly-discovered territories—not countries acquired by conquest or cession—they carry with them the laws of this country. In that case cession could not take place without the consent of Parliament. In the case of conquered or ceded countries, if Parliament had legislated concerning those countries, then I apprehend the concurrence of Parliament might be necessary.

GOVERNMENT OF THE NORTH WESTERN PROVINCES OF INDIA. QUESTION.

MR. VANSITTART said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true that he has issued instructions to remove the Seat of Government of the North Western Provinces from Agra to Allahabad ; if so, whether he has any objection to the production of the Correspondence relating to the same ?

SIR CHARLES WOOD, in reply, said, he had issued no such instructions as those referred to, and no correspondence, that he was aware of, had taken place on the subject.

CASE OF LIEUTENANT COLONEL CHARTERIS.—QUESTION.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for War, What are the terms of the Regulation under which Lieutenant Colonel Charteris, who entered the Army in 1840, and who has not therefore completed his term of twenty-five years' service, is allowed the special indulgence of exchanging on half-pay with an Officer whose first Commission is dated 1830 ?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, in reply, that a Royal Warrant was issued in January last, which embodied what was understood to be the Regulations formerly in force. That Warrant permitted one Officer to exchange with another Officer on half-pay. But it was not understood that the Warrant was to introduce any new conditions, and the constant practice of the War Department and the Horse Guards was in accordance with the Regulations before they were put into the shape of a Warrant.

ARTERIAL DRAINAGE IN IRELAND.

QUESTION.

MR. BAGWELL said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, If it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to authorize the Board of Works to proceed as formerly with works of Arterial Drainage in Ireland, and to place at the disposal, of the said Board for that purpose sufficient funds, repayable by instalments, by the owners of the land improved by such works of Drainage?

MR. PEEL, said, in reply, that it was not the intention of the Government to authorize the Board of Works to proceed with works of Arterial Drainage in Ireland.

CONSTABULARY HORSES.

QUESTION.

MR. HUNT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether, in consequence of the small number of horses kept for hire in some parts of the country, and the difficulty experienced by the County Constabulary in obtaining horses on hire from licensed persons, the Government will consider the propriety of recommending to Parliament to exempt from duty horses hired for Police Service, on the same principle on which an exemption is now allowed by law in the case of horses hired to convey prisoners to Gaol?

MR. PEEL, in reply, said, it was objectionable to multiply exemptions from general laws. Except in a few places the Police had no difficulty in procuring horses from licensed persons, and as those persons paid a heavy duty, it was not desirable to interfere with their trade. The Government, therefore, did not intend to extend the exemption referred to by the hon. Member.

COOLIE IMMIGRATION INTO THE ISLAND OF REUNION.

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

MR. CAVE, on rising to move an Address on this subject, said, that as he had more than once called the attention of the House to this subject, he would state very briefly his reasons for again introducing it; and would beg permission before doing so to recapitulate, by way of preface, the transactions to which his Motion referred. It was well known that the French emancipated their slaves after the Revolution of 1848, and that the result in their colonies, as in ours, had been great difficulty in carrying on cultivation, in consequence of the dislike of the negroes to regular work. There were published annually in France expositions of the state of the empire, called Livres Jaunes, which, by a pardonable Hibernicism, had been termed French blue-books; Certain hon. Members, in perusing that portion of those books which related to the Colonial Department, might perhaps wonder that so profound a politician as the French Emperor should set a high value on his colonies; but so it was. The Emperor anxiously desired the prosperity of his colonies; and seeing that the only way to make them to compete with slave countries was to give them abundance of labour, unlike our Government, which for years threw every obstacle in the way of our colonies obtaining labour, he made it an object of Imperial solicitude. The earliest results of his exertions were not happy; they were the so-called free emigration from Africa, the consequent difficulty with Portugal about the Charles et Georges, and the very natural desire of the Government of this country to put an end to so questionable and troublesome a system. The price paid to the French for giving up recruiting on the coast of Africa consisted of two treaties, one concluded in 1860, the other in 1861, by which France was permitted to draw labourers from British India. He could not wonder that this concession appeared at first sight expedient, or at any rate the least of two evils. But it must be borne in mind that the Government of this country had wisely declared that the Indian emigrants were not capable of taking care of themselves. They had therefore laid down rules for the protection of these emigrants, and appointed officers to see that those rules were observed. With regard to our own colonies, trickery and concealment were impossible, and he had himself this Session induced the hon. Member for Honiton (Mr. Moffatt) to add to his annual Returns on the subject of immigration the number who returned each year to their own country and the amount of earnings they carried with them, so that the House might see at a glance the workwas ready to show them to his hon. Friend, and if there were any among them which his hon. Friend thought it important or expedient to submit to the House, he would have great pleasure in doing what he could to meet his wishes. Upon that understanding, he trusted the Motion would be withdrawn.

SIR MINTO FARQUHAR said, he had supported his hon. Friend (Mr. Cave) on a former occasion, when he brought the question of the Treaty with France for the immigration of Coolies into Réunion before the House, and he was really surprised to find how truly prophetic the words spoken by his hon. Friend at the time had proved. He was glad to have the opportunity of now supporting him again. They all abominated everything approaching to the name of slavery, and after what had been stated there was every reason why they should specially consider the case of the Coolies sent to this French Colony, who were British subjects, and as such had every claim to their protection. They had all heard of a mariage de convenance, but this was the case of a traité de convenance, enabling the French Government to introduce a system which really amounted to slavery under another name. The Emperor had, it was true, given up the slave trade, but he was determined, that whatever the English might do, his colonies should not go out of cultivation for want of labourers; and when urged by the British not to procure them from Africa, he consented, on condition that England supplied him with coolies. It was upon this consideration that the British Government entered into the treaty with France; and there was established what was in reality, though not in name, slavery. Earl Russell, in the House of Commons at the time, himself expressed great doubts as to the policy of entering into this treaty; but, he added, the circumstances were so peculiar, that we might try the experiment, the object being, moreover, to prevent a renewal of the slave trade. He felt convinced that the greatest possible vigilance on the part of our Foreign Office was indispensable in this matter. Since the treaty 9,000 coolies had, as he had heard, been taken to Réunion. Having entered into such a treaty with France, the Dances now pressed us for coolies to be sent to Santa Cruz. A competition was thus springing up on the part of other countries for these labourers; and so anxious were the French to get them to Bourbon that they were not particular as to what class of coolies they belonged, but took the weak and infirm and obliged them to work beyond their strength. We never allowed a single coolie to be sent to a British colony without carefully looking after him, from the day he started till the day he arrived, and also during the whole period of his stay there, and indeed up to the time when he was again landed in India. It was only proper and honourable to us that the same protection should be extended over these persons sent to a foreign Colony, who, as the hon. Under Secretary said, were often ignorant and unable to take care of themselves. He earnestly trusted, that unless they were as well treated in the French as they were in the English colonies, Her Majesty's Government would refuse to renew the treaty.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he thought there was a screw loose somewhere in that matter of the Bourbon immigration. The coolies, he must observe, who emigrated to Ceylon and the Mauritius were a perfectly intelligent people, and quite capable of understanding the nature of the bargain they were entering into. It was quite true that our own coolies were well taken care of, and well looked after, both on board ship and in the colonies. They were also, generally speaking, able-bodied men. But that was not the case with the coolies who were taken to Réunion, and if the cripples were cast adrift, as had been represented, our Government ought to take care that none but healthy immigrants were taken to Réunion, and that the same guarantees for their proper treatment while there should be obtained as existed in regard to the coolies in our own colonies. It was not usual for the French, as colonists, to oppress their labourers; but it would seem that a scandalous state of things prevailed at Réunion, though he was sure that a fair representation of any injurious treatment would insure a speedy remedy.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he thought that if anything was done to check the immigration of Indians into the French colonies, it would be attended with great injury to the coolies themselves. He had always looked upon emigration from the over-peopled regions of the East as the real way of putting an end to the slavery and the slave trade; and he saw no difficulty in their ascertaining the actual condition of these labourers while living in French colonies. When the treaty was negotiated with France, the Government of that country proposed that the immigrants should be placed under the same regulations as those who were sent to English Colonies. Had that arrangement not been carried out? If it had, it was probable that the sufferings of the coolies had not been very great. The term of service in our own Colonies was five years, and the sum of money which each man brought home with him was a sufficient proof that the treaty worked well. Of these sums a Return was regularly made to our Government; and why should not similar Returns be made to our Foreign Office of the savings of the labourers in the French colonies? In that way it might be easily ascertained whether they were less prosperous than our own.

Mr. Layard

MR. CAVE said, in reply, that he was quite aware that a large number of Madras coolies had been smuggled into Réunion, and had called attention to the fact in 1860; but his present Motion referred only to those who had been imported under treaty, he considered what had been stated by his hon. Friend (Mr. Layard) as the strongest condemnation that could be pronounced against the system. In acceding to his proposition, therefore, he must say, if they could not agree as to the papers to be produced, he should feel at perfect liberty on some future day to make another Motion on the subject.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

INCOME TAX.—RESOLUTION.

MR. HUBBARD said, he rose to move the Resolution of which he had given notice relative to the Income Tax. The provision of funds in a country like England, to meet the large unproductive expenditure, even curtailed as far as the safety of the country would permit, must always be a matter of very serious consideration; and it became still more serious when they considered that their indirect taxation was now narrowed to a very few articles, tea and sugar, the two most important, being subject to heavy duties imposed to assist in meeting a war expenditure. Nothing could be more natural than that there should be a loud and urgent cry for the reduction of these war duties. But a cry, at least, as loud and urgent, was raised for a reduction or removal of the income tax. It was not only unpopular in itself in the highest degree, but its existence was a memorial of broken faith and of the fallaciousness of all prophetic finance. But why should the income tax be thus unpopular? The annual expenditure of this country required an annual provision which must be raised out of the incomes of the people; and at first sight it would seem that an income tax was the most natural source for providing an important portion of revenue. But it was an undoubted fact that the income tax was detested. The only reason for that detestation was that the income tax was founded upon no principle whatever. It was not a creation of their own days, but came from the darkest ages of finance, and had never been proposed but for a temporary purpose—never introduced or accepted but under the solemn assurance that its days were numbered. What was now the prospect of its days being numbered it was not for him to decide; but, whether or not it were retained as a means of raising a permanent revenue or consigned to the armoury of fiscal legislation for future exigencies, he thought it equally the duty of the House not to part with it till they had placed it on a definite and acknowledged principle. Circumstances many years ago had attracted his attention to the working of the income tax, and gave him a peculiar insight into many of its more important provisions. Two years ago he moved for a Committee on the subject, and his right hon. Friend would forgive him for saying that neither the conclusions at which that Committee arrived, nor the rejection by the House of his propositions last year, had left on his mind the slightest feeling of discouragement. Those who like him had been fated to contend with the ablest men of a powerful Government, both in the Committee and the House, would sympathize with him when he said that he never felt more confident in the soundness of his principle and the ultimate triumph of his cause, and he could not acknowledge a defeat in numbers to be a defeat in principle. He was far from undervaluing the force of the opposition which had been brought against him; nor did he believe that either the House or the country thought lightly of that opposition. But if an opposition came with evidence of its being founded on an entire misconception of the principle and misconstruction of the objects at which he aimed, he felt that such an opposition he was bound not to succumb to, but to surmount; and having searched carefully through the whole series of debates he was prepared to give to the articles of indictment against him a distinct and deliberate negative. It had been imputed to him that in the conduct of the question he had propounded an impracticable scheme—that the scheme would create inequalities more numerous and grave than it removed, that he was attempting class legislation, that he proposed to violate a solemn compact with the fundholders, to give undue advantages to the capitalist and the great merchant, and lastly, and the heaviest blow of all, that his scheme was especially hostile to the agricultural interest and would seriously aggravate the damage that interest already suffered through the infliction of the income tax. He met that indictment frankly and fearlessly, and to every one of its allegations he gave an open distinct denial. He asked for nothing but a fair hearing. If the allegations were borne out, let the House reject the plan he proposed. If they were disproved, he thought he might fairly ask the House to bear with him while he endeavoured to supply the deficiency of principle in the income tax, and that he might ask his opponents to reconsider a scheme which they had misunderstood. It had been objected that his was not an original proposition; but so far from aiming at originality, that was the very thing he wished to avoid. The strength of his scheme was not that it was new, but that he could allege in its support the most undoubted and invaluable authorities. Confining himself for the present to the first part of his Motion, he would recall the attention of the House to the principle laid down when the Parochial Assessment Act was passed in 1836. That Act, after reciting that it was desirable that a uniform mode of rating for the relief of the poor should be established, enacted that no rate should thenceforth be allowed unless it were made on an estimate of the net annual value of the several hereditaments, such net annual value to be obtained by deducting the average annual cost of maintenance from the rents of the hereditaments themselves. That was a principle which he thought was most sound. It was a principle which was reaffirmed only last Session by that House, where, in the Union Assessment Act, it not only confirmed previous legislation, but confirmed in distinct terms the very definition to which he was drawing attention—namely, the necessity of arriving at a net annual value before assessment was made. Why, if that were a principle acknowledge to be desirable for local taxation, should it be said to be undesirable or inexpedient for imperial taxation? That was a question to which, if a negative answer could be given, he would be glad to hear it. He had to contend that the same principle was applicable in both cases, but he contended, moreover, that any inequality, any inconvenience, arising in local taxation from the absence of an accurate basis, was trivial as compared with the inconvenience arising from taxation of the gross rental instead of the net, in cases of income tax. At that point he would not trust to his own arguments, but would refer to the highest authority—authority most undeniable on the particular point—namely, that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself in 1853. That right hon. Gentleman, in proposing his Budget, said—

“I estimate that one fourth part of the gross income derived from land and houses goes into the pockets not of persons beneficially interested in them, properly speaking, but into those of mortgagees, annuitants, and others who receive under settlements. If that be so, then it appears that the owners of land and houses do not receive £87,200,000, but from that sum you must deduct the fourth part of £80,000,000, which reduces their income to £47,200,000. This sum of £47,200,000 is then the net receipt of those beneficially interested in land and houses. But you will justly say that the encumbrancers, who receive the £20,000,000 pay the income tax. Well, let us see what their quota amounts to:—7d. in the pound on £20,000,000 gives £583,000; deduct this sum from the £2,333,000 paid by the owners of land and houses, and the sum of £1,750,000 will be left, and this is the amount actually paid on an income of £47,200,000. Now, if hon. Members will take the trouble to apply the figures I have stated they will find the result to be this:—That the sum of 9d. in the pound on a net income of £47,200,000 would amount to £1,732,500, and that, consequently, under the law as it now stands, the income derived from land and houses is taxed at the rate, not of 7d., but 9d. in the pound.”

That statement was most important, and he believed most accurate; but he would ask why had the landed interest been left in that most desolate condition for the last ten years? The measure of distress described in those remarks was only the average measure, and gave no idea of some extreme cases that might occur. The total annual value of houses and land was £80,000,000, from which must be deducted £12,800,000 for cost of maintenance, leaving £67,200,000 as the available income. But that income did not belong exclusively to the landowner, the claimants for life interests and mortgagees receiving their shares, upon the net amounts of which they paid income tax. The landed proprietors paid income tax not only upon what they received, but on their outgoings of £12,800,000 besides. Of all the grievances arising out of the mode of levying the income tax none was more oppressive than that which fell upon incumbered land. But these average results did not show the extreme limits of the grievance. He would put a case illustrating facts of which he was personally cognizant. A property was leased at £800 a year. The outgoings might be averaged at 10 per cent, leaving £720; but there was a mortgage upon the property for £16,000 at 4 per cent interest, which swallowed up £640, leaving only £80 net income to the proprietor. The mortgagees paid income tax upon the £640 he received; but the tax being levied upon the whole value of the property, the landowner had to pay, not upon the £80 he received, but upon £160, or at the rate of 1s. 6d. in the pound, instead of 9d. Supposing the rate of interest upon the mortgage debt had been raised to 4½ per cent it would have absorbed £720, thus leaving nothing for the landowner, who, nevertheless, would have had to pay the tax upon £80 a year. When he was told that his plan would create greater grievances than any already existing, he invited hon. Gentlemen to suggest a worse instance than the one he had given. He thanked his right hon. Friend, and he was sure the House would thank him, for having forced this grievance upon their notice; for he confessed he should not himself have thought of searching in Schedule A for the graver defects of the law, being satisfied, that as his principle was sound, it must in application correct any grievance arising from comparative poverty or riches. The grievance was now clearly exposed, and he thought it required great confidence to tell the landed interest that they were benefited by the present arrangement of paying upon sixty-seven millions, when in fact they only received forty-seven millions. Although he did not pretend to be the friend of any particular interest, but was simply acting in the cause of justice, he declared that no charge could be more unfounded than that the plan he advocated would aggravate the injury suffered by the landed interest. In making such a charge the right hon. Gentleman had, without intending it, misled the House, especially when he stated the effect of the proposed change would be to raise the tax upon the unencumbered residue of landed property from 11½d., as at present, to 13½d. in the pound. The question to be considered was how were the grievances which he had pointed out to be removed. There was one effectual but simple method of dealing with them, and that was to apply to the case of income tax upon the rent of land and houses precisely the same principle as the House had affirmed to be proper in the case of local taxation—namely, to place the tax on the net ratable value of the land. Let that be done, and all inequalities would vanish, for whatever might be the amount of income the tax would be divided ratably among all parties interested. And he would remind the House that the mortgagee, whom he wished to see fairly sharing the burden of taxation with the landed proprietor, was the rich capitalist, whom it was alleged his scheme would chiefly benefit. If the House would refer to a Parliamentary paper published last year, and numbered 397, and would reduce the results to a 9d. tax, they would see that he had ground for affirming that the assessment on land and houses, combined under the wider operation by the scheme he proposed, would be 9d. and 64-100ths. That was the point to which the assessment of real property would descend from 11½d., at which his right hon. Friend fixed it under the present system. It was not merely land or houses that would receive benefit from that rational mode of taxation, but mines, quarries, and every kind of property would share in it equally; nay, it would carry relief even to that most helpless individual, the owner of a terminable annuity, who would find comfort and relief in the application of that simple principle of taxing nothing but net income. To show how that relief could be given, he had only to refer again to what had been done by legislation under the guidance of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. In 1846 the Government lent £3,000,000 to landowners, to be repaid by annual instalments extending over twenty-two years. Under the ordinary operation of the law those landowners, in making their instalments, would be entitled to deduct the income tax on the whole amount, as in 1853 a measure was introduced, or rather a provision was introduced in the general measure of the budget to the following effect:—

Mr. Hubbard

“ That whereas advances of public money have been made, and the repayment has been secured

of indictment against him a distinct and deliberate negative. It had been imputed to him that in the conduct of the question he had propounded an impracticable scheme—that the scheme would create inequalities more numerous and grave than it removed, that he was attempting class legislation, that he proposed to violate a solemn compact with the fundholders, to give undue advantages to the capitalist and the great merchant, and lastly, and the heaviest blow of all, that his scheme was especially hostile to the agricultural interest and would seriously aggravate the damage that interest already suffered through the infliction of the income tax. He met that indictment frankly and fearlessly, and to every one of its allegations he gave an open distinct denial. He asked for nothing but a fair hearing. If the allegations were borne out, let the House reject the plan he proposed. If they were disproved, he thought he might fairly ask the House to bear with him while he endeavoured to supply the deficiency of principle in the income tax, and that he might ask his opponents to reconsider a scheme which they had misunderstood. It had been objected that his was not an original proposition; but so far from aiming at originality, that was the very thing he wished to avoid. The strength of his scheme was not that it was new, but that he could allege in its support the most undoubted and invaluable authorities. Confining himself for the present to the first part of his Motion, he would recall the attention of the House to the principle laid down when the Parochial Assessment Act was passed in 1836. That Act, after reciting that it was desirable that a uniform mode of rating for the relief of the poor should be established, enacted that no rate should thenceforth be allowed unless it were made on an estimate of the net annual value of the several hereditaments, such net annual value to be obtained by deducting the average annual cost of maintenance from the rents of the hereditaments themselves. That was a principle which he thought was most sound. It was a principle which was reaffirmed only last Session by that House, where, in the Union Assessment Act, it not only confirmed previous legislation, but confirmed in distinct terms the very definition to which he was drawing attention—namely, the necessity of arriving at a net annual value before assessment was made. Why, if that were a principle acknowledge to be desirable for local taxation, should it be said to be undesirable or inexpedient for imperial taxation? That was a question to which, if a negative answer could be given, he would be glad to hear it. He had to contend that the same principle was applicable in both cases, but he contended, moreover, that any inequality, any inconvenience, arising in local taxation from the absence of an accurate basis, was trivial as compared with the inconvenience arising from taxation of the gross rental instead of the net, in cases of income tax. At that point he would not trust to his own arguments, but would refer to the highest authority—authority most undeniable on the particular point—namely, that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself in 1853. That right hon. Gentleman, in proposing his Budget, said—

Mr. Hubbard

“I estimate that one fourth part of the gross income derived from land and houses goes into the pockets not of persons beneficially interested in them, properly speaking, but into those of mortgagees, annuitants, and others who receive under settlements. If that be so, then it appears that the owners of land and houses do not receive £67,200,000, but from that sum you must deduct the fourth part of £80,000,000, which reduces their income to £47,200,000. This sum of £47,200,000 is then the net receipt of those beneficially interested in land and houses. But you will justly say that the encumbrancers, who receive the £20,000,000 pay the income tax. Well, let us see what their quota amounts to:—7d. in the pound on £20,000,000 gives £583,000; deduct this sum from the £2,333,000 paid by the owners of land and houses, and the sum of £1,750,000 will be left, and this is the amount actually paid on an income of £47,200,000. Now, if hon. Members will take the trouble to apply the figures I have stated they will find the result to be this:—That the sum of 9d. in the pound on a net income of £47,200,000 would amount to £1,732,500, and that, consequently, under the law as it now stands, the income derived from land and houses is taxed at the rate, not of 7d., but 9d. in the pound.”

That statement was most important, and he believed most accurate; but he would ask why had the landed interest been left in that most desolate condition for the last ten years? The measure of distress described in those remarks was only the average measure, and gave no idea of some extreme cases that might occur. The total annual value of houses and land was £80,000,000, from which must be deducted £12,800,000 for cost of maintenance, leaving £67,200,000 as the available income. But that income did not belong exclusively to the landowner, the claimants for life interests and mortgagees receiving their shares, upon the net amounts of which they paid income tax. The landed proprietors paid income tax not only upon what they received, but on their outgoings of £12,800,000 besides. Of all the grievances arising out of the mode of levying the income tax none was more oppressive than that which fell upon incumbered land. But these average results did not show the extreme limits of the grievance. He would put a case illustrating facts of which he was personally cognizant. A property was leased at £800 a year. The outgoings might be averaged at 10 per cent, leaving £720; but there was a mortgage upon the property for £16,000 at 4 per cent interest, which swallowed up £640, leaving only £80 net income to the proprietor. The mortgagee paid income tax upon the £640 he received; but the tax being levied upon the whole value of the property, the landowner had to pay, not upon the £80 he received, but upon £160, or at the rate of 1s. 6d. in the pound, instead of 9d. Supposing the rate of interest upon the mortgage debt had been raised to 4½ per cent it would have absorbed £720, thus leaving nothing for the landowner, who, nevertheless, would have had to pay the tax upon £80 a year. When he was told that his plan would create greater grievances than any already existing, he invited hon. Gentlemen to suggest a worse instance than the one he had given. He thanked his right hon. Friend, and he was sure the House would thank him, for having forced this grievance upon their notice; for he confessed he should not himself have thought of searching in Schedule A for the graver defects of the law, being satisfied, that as his principle was sound, it must in application correct any grievance arising from comparative poverty or riches. The grievance was now clearly exposed, and he thought it required great confidence to tell the landed interest that they were benefited by the present arrangement of paying upon sixty-seven millions, when in fact they only received forty-seven millions. Although he did not pretend to be the friend of any particular interest, but was simply acting in the cause of justice, he declared that no charge could be more unfounded than that the plan he advocated would aggravate the injury suffered by the landed interest. In making such a charge the right hon. Gentleman had, without intending it, misled the House, especially when he stated the effect of the proposed change would be to raise the tax upon the unencumbered residue of landed property from 11½d., as at present, to 13½d. in the pound. The question to be considered was how were the grievances which he had pointed out to be removed. There was one effectual but simple method of dealing with them, and that was to apply to the case of income tax upon the rent of land and houses precisely the same principle as the House had affirmed to be proper in the case of local taxation—namely, to place the tax on the net ratable value of the land. Let that be done, and all inequalities would vanish, for whatever might be the amount of income the tax would be divided ratably among all parties interested. And he would remind the House that the mortgagee, whom he wished to see fairly sharing the burden of taxation with the landed proprietor, was the rich capitalist, whom it was alleged his scheme would chiefly benefit. If the House would refer to a Parliamentary paper published last year, and numbered 397, and would reduce the results to a 9d. tax, they would see that he had ground for affirming that the assessment on land and houses, combined under the wider operation by the scheme he proposed, would be 9d. and 64-100ths. That was the point to which the assessment of real property would descend from 11½d., at which his right hon. Friend fixed it under the present system. It was not merely land or houses that would receive benefit from that rational mode of taxation, but mines, quarries, and every kind of property would share in it equally; nay, it would carry relief even to that most helpless individual, the owner of a terminable annuity, who would find comfort and relief in the application of that simple principle of taxing nothing but net income. To show how that relief could be given, he had only to refer again to what had been done by legislation under the guidance of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. In 1846 the Government lent £3,000,000 to landowners, to be repaid by annual instalments extending over twenty-two years. Under the ordinary operation of the law those landowners, in making their instalments, would be entitled to deduct the income tax on the whole amount, as in 1853 a measure was introduced, or rather a provision was introduced in the general measure of the budget to the following effect:—

“That whereas advances of public money have been made, and the repayment has been secured

by a rentcharge, by which the principal sums advanced will be eventually repaid with interest, it is just that provision should be made for deducting the duty charged by this Act in proportion to such interest."

With regard to that, Mr. Timms, the law adviser to the Board of Inland Revenue, said that the circumstances were peculiar; and the peculiarity seemed to be, that whereas in the case of every other terminable annuity the State was the debtor, in these peculiar Acts the State was the creditor; so that it deliberately made a law carrying out with regard to its debtors a principle which it utterly denied as a matter of justice to its creditors. He wished to know whether in England such an utter subversion of justice should be tolerated as thus to make one law for the debtor and another for the creditor of the State. For his own part he thought, that if they wished to make the income tax regarded with constant hatred and contempt the Government could do no better than perpetuate such a law.

He next passed to the second clause of his Resolution, relating to the relief of industrial incomes. That question had already been argued most largely, and he would therefore simply state the principle he adopted:—"Industrial profits are partially applied as income to purposes of expenditure, the residue passes into investment, and as capital yields new products for taxation. If therefore the portion saved is taxed, it is taxed twice—first as profits and again in its subsequent products." The question had been looked at in every possible light, but there was a general agreement in demanding very nearly the same remedy—namely, a concession in the amount of assessment. Here, again, he would refer to legislative precedent. In 1853 a clause was introduced into the Bill for the renewal of the income tax, awarding to the extent of one-sixth of his income a remission of the tax to every individual who spent the portion so saved in the purchase of life policies. He asked Mr. Pressly, chairman of the Inland Revenue, upon what he conceived the policy of that concession to be founded, and his answer was distinct. He said that that portion was exempt from taxation "because it was considered no part of a man's income." The principle was excellent; the mode in which it was carried out was open to grave reprehension. He would state this objection in the words of a most able and critical writer of the present day, who remarked—

Mr. Hubbard

"It is no part of the duty of the State to give bounties to saving, or to lay penalties on expenditure. The State cannot put itself in the position of individuals, and judge for them; and as it cannot judge whether it is better for a man to save or to spend, it ought not to interfere. A father, for instance, may do more wisely if he expend £200 a year in giving his son a good education than by laying by the money, and the State ought not to punish him for doing so."

At the present moment the following case might arise:—A and B, two men in the same profession, each received £1,200 a year. Of that income A spent £200 a year in the education of his son, and B £200 in the purchase of a life annuity. The law remitted the tax upon B's life policy and it taxed A for his expenditure upon his son's education; so that, as now administered, it contravened the excellent policy laid down by the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe). Now, his proposal was that upon professional incomes a concession should be made of one-third, and A and B would therefore both be taxed upon £800, and would be left perfectly free to apply their respective incomes as they chose. While, therefore, he adhered to the principle affirmed by the Act of 1853, he entirely condemned the mode in which it was endeavoured to be carried out, believing that nothing could be more tyrannical and impertinent than for the law to interfere and dictate in what shape a man should make his investment in order to be entitled to exemption. His proposition was conceived in the very words of his right hon. Friend in 1853, and that, he thought, must commend it strongly to the acceptance of the House. His right hon. Friend might, indeed, say, "It is one thing to admit that a certain remedy is desirable, and another thing to say that it is practicable." Now, upon the practicability of his scheme he could not wish to find more trustworthy evidence than that of the late Chairman of the Inland Revenue Office. An admirable servant of his country, Mr. Pressly, was a most rigid adherent to things as they are, and under the influence of this strong Conservative tendency, with a strong perception of what was the feeling of the Government, he was not likely to concede any point which he did not feel bound as a man of honour to concede. Mr. Pressly was asked what were the points as to which he would find a difficulty in carrying out this measure. He mentioned two points. That was in the very earliest stage of the inquiry ; but towards its close Mr. Pressly, having had laid before him papers relating to these two subjects, distinctly admitted that upon both points his difficulties were removed, adding that he had no objection to offer upon any other portion of the scheme. He appealed, therefore, to this as conclusive evidence in favour of the practicability of his proposal ; and he might mention—not out of mere display, but to show that he had tried to set his mind to the solution of this question—that he had in his possession, drawn up by an eminent draughtsman, every provision which would be required to carry out his scheme.

Another and very serious charge was that his scheme would create inequalities more numerous and more grave than those which it removed. Now, the only grievance of that kind which had come to his knowledge was this—that he proposed to treat upon a different footing the profits arising from public companies and from private partnerships. With respect to public companies, they consisted of managers and clerks, who supplied the skill, labour, and intelligence, and of proprietors, who supplied the capital, had nothing whatever to do with the management, and received their dividends at the appointed time, just as they would the interest of money in the funds or in any other investment. At present the law taxed both those classes equally, but, according to the principle he submitted to the consideration of the House, the dividends of public companies would be fully taxed, while the intelligent managers and clerks who carried on the business would receive a proportionate abatement on the amount of their stipends or salaries. In private companies the partners among themselves provided both capital and management, and the result was one and inseparable. It might be said, that in perfect analogy with the case of public companies the capital and profits of partnerships should be separately assessed. There might be some large establishments which would make the requisite return ; but nine-tenths of the whole number would be unable to do so, for they could not dis sever the value of the capital from the value of the services which made that capital productive. In like manner, though there might be some instances in which professions were carried on with nothing but skill and intelligence, yet, generally speaking, capital, in one way or another, crept in, and contributed to professional profits, so that a distinction could not be made between professions and trades, and a principle could not be laid down on which separate assessments could be made.

It was also stated, that the rich capitalists and bankers were his clients, and that he was endeavouring to obtain for them a very unfair and improper advantage. Now, bankers' securities consisted in part—far the largest portion of them—of Government securities, railway securities, and private and public bonds, on the interest of which they paid income tax, and it never reached them without the deduction of that tax. As regarded the whole of that source of revenue, the effect of his proposition would be, that, instead of diminishing, it would aggravate the burden of their contribution to the Exchequer. With regard to the great brewers, great merchants, and others, they had a special advantage under the 133rd clause of the Act, which declared that whatever might be the amount of the average profits upon which they had been assessed, they should in a subsequent year be assessed wholly on the amount they had made ; and that if that amount fell ever so far short of the average they returned, they should be entitled to the full abatement. Mr. Pressly said, that under the operation of that clause, great merchants, great brewers, and great manufacturers, whose profits were subjected to vicissitudes, had the means of escaping paying half or little more of the income tax, in the most legal manner. He asked why those individuals should be entitled to this prerogative, which was not shared in by professional men, by salaried officers of the State, or by employés in private life ? He asked those persons to surrender that peculiar privilege, and take their share of a more fair and equitable taxation. There was another point on which he desired to offer an observation. Whenever it was desired to make a hard hit in debate, something was said about keeping faith with the fundholder. The English mind was peculiarly sensitive, and very rightly, on that point ; but by his proposition the funds would not be taxed in any special manner, but would be treated only like other analogous income. As to the charge of class legislation, he wished to say, that no charge, in his opinion, could be considered more odious ; but he challenged any one to point to a single word in anything he had said or written on the subject which could bear such a construction. He had felt it his duty to explain his scheme for the purpose of showing its consistency and safety, but he would, on that occasion, simply submit to the House the proposition, "that with regard to invested property, net income should only be assessed, and that some abatement ought to be made, for the purpose of taxation, from the net amount of industrial incomes." No result was more to be dreaded than that those who were aggrieved by the existing system should be driven by a continued refusal of relief into a stolid indifference, and should say to the Government, "Do your worst; we will take care of ourselves." He wished to press on the House the necessity of laying down some definite course of policy, and of directing the Government to reconstruct the tax, if it was to be renewed, in such a manner as to carry out what Adam Smith had declared to be the essential principle of all taxation, "That the subjects of every State ought to contribute to its support in proportion to the revenue which they may respectively enjoy." He therefore begged to move, as affirming the principle of an income tax—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the incidents of an Income Tax touching the products of invested property should fall upon net income, and that the net amounts of industrial earnings should, previous to assessment, be subject to such an abatement as may equitably adjust the burden thrown upon intelligence and skill as compared with property."

Mr. LEATHAM rose to second the Resolution, and said: Mr. Speaker, Sir, I think that any one who proposes to reconstruct the income tax upon some simple principle which shall remove all its inequalities and render it a tax justly levied upon the revenue of every one, must be either strangely unfamiliar with the difficulties which beset this question, or singularly confident in his own omnipotence. But although I fear that we must despair of doing justice to everybody, that is no reason why we should despair of redressing some of the more prominent inequalities, and so doing to large classes of persons a justice which, if it be not absolute, is at least comparative and approximate. If it be contended that with all our Amendments there must still remain much injustice unredressed, it is at least worth while to see whether we cannot reduce the sum of our necessary injustice to a minimum; and if it be objected that the tax is in its operation so full of inequalities that we are bewildered where to begin redressing them, instead of sitting down patiently under such a confession on our part, I fear that taxpayers will rather incline to use the language of a great statesman, once a very eminent Member of this House, and to ask whether "they are to despair of justice because they have need of so great justice." And, Sir, a special reason for moving in this matter now seems to me to be afforded by the change which has taken place in the policy of those who are for maintaining the tax as it is. The plea which used to be put forward was that the tax was lying under sentence of death, that it had but a little time to live, and that it was not worth while elaborately to reconstruct an impost which was trembling upon the verge of dissolution. But all this is changed now. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who told us, in 1853, that "it was on all hands agreed that this tax was not adapted for a permanent part of your fiscal system, unless by reconstruction you could remove its inequalities," is now the strenuous advocate of an unadjusted income tax, and tells us, for our comfort, in the same breath, that "he thinks some better Chancellor of the Exchequer may, in some happier times, achieve the great accomplishment of abolishing this tax." Why, the right hon. Gentleman has even discontinued the performance of the annual pantomime, in which he carried the tax with great pomp to its burial, and then with equal pomp restored it again to life. The tax has not even the decency to die once a year, but has taken its place among the permanent sources of the revenue. And if any one were in doubt as to the policy of the Government with reference to it, he has only to refer to the evidence taken before the Committee appointed the year before last, and to watch the part played in that Committee by Members of the Administration. Besides the Chancellor of the Exchequer, then sat upon the Committee another right hon. Gentleman, the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, who lavished his ingenuity upon the answers of illogical physicians and other well-meaning persons who had only English common sense to help them, and who were therefore babes and sucklings in the hands of a right hon. Gentleman armed with all the logic of the schools. And since I have referred to the Report, permit me to express the disappointment which I believe the whole commercial community experienced at the abortive result of the labours of the Committee. Besides the illogical physicians, they examined some of the first statisticians and some of the most eminent political economists in the country. The most elaborate argumentation took place; every point was examined with the utmost nicety; no effort seemed to be spared in order to mystify and complicate the question; and then, when they had led us step by step into the very heart of the labyrinth, and we were looking to them for the clue which was to lead us safely out again, your Committee blew out the light and laughed in our faces. Yes, Sir, after this prodigious labour of the mountain, this ridiculous mouse of a Report was born. Nor can it be contended that the Committee had no leisure to prepare a Report. By a reference to the blue-book, I find that they took a whole month to frame it. They had an abundance of digested materials. The hon. Chairman prepared a Report. That Report they discarded—they do not vouchsafe to tell us why. For anything we can gather, for no better reason than that which made Dr. Fell so unpopular. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Wilts—whom I regret not to see in his place—whom we all regret not to see in his place—who has devoted much attention to this question—prepared a Report. That was discarded. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President prepared a Report, which was at least a high intellectual treat. That was discarded. The hon. Baronet the Member for Stamford prepared a Report. That Report was embodied in the Report of the Committee. But before embodying the Report of the hon. Baronet, the Committee took an unusual precaution—they disembowelled it. Having emptied out the Report of the hon. Baronet, they proceeded to fit it up with an interior of their own manufacture, the substance of which was that the objections to this tax were objections to its essence and nature, and not to its incidence (although how the Committee extracted that from the evidence I am at a loss to conceive); and secondly, that you must not reconstruct the income tax without taking into consideration the pressure of other taxation upon the various interests of the country, and especially of the succession duty. Why, Sir (although I know that another opinion has been expressed in this House), unsophisticated persons in the country imagined that the succession duty was imposed in order to remedy a great and startling injustice under which personalty laboured when passing from father to son—although how completely it has failed to do so, through a system of evasion, there is no one in the House so well qualified as the right hon. Gentleman himself to tell. And as regards the pressure of other taxation upon the various classes in the country, I commend the discretion of the Committee in that they did not carry their investigations into this branch of the question; for had they done so, I am convinced that such an investigation would have disclosed anomalies in quite an opposite direction, which perhaps it would be safer to conceal. And this is the Report which is to extinguish the most wide-spread discontent which was probably ever excited by any unjust direct tax, and which is to eradicate the profound and universal instinct by which, from one end of the country to the other, the injustice of this tax has been condemned. When such was the Report, and such the men who framed it, we naturally enough supposed that they were reserving the reasons upon which it was founded for purposes of debate. It was therefore with considerable anxiety that we awaited the debate which took place when my hon. Friend brought his Motion before the House. We saw the name of the hon. Baronet upon the paper. I think we saw the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President in his place. We expected much from both the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. baronet. My hon. Friend made his statement with his usual clearness. He was ably seconded by my hon. Friend the Member for the City. We looked towards the hon. Baronet and the right hon. Gentleman. The hon. Baronet withdrew from the paper, the right hon. Gentleman retired from his place, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer was left single-handed to vindicate the Report of the Committee, and to dispose of the case of my hon. Friend. Now, I am not going to deny that the right hon. Gentleman made on that occasion a most masterly speech. I have seldom listened to a speech of the right hon. Gentleman which was otherwise than masterly. We all know that the right hon. Gentleman possesses, in an eminent degree, the faculty of clothing the dry bones of a financial question like this with comeliness and life. We all know that he often illustrates and embellishes the whole with his eloquence, and now and then that he condescends to throw over it the brilliant halo of his imagination. If ever the right hon. Gentleman dazzled the House, it was upon the occasion to which I refer. He positively extinguished the debate. I watched hon. Members who had intended to take part in it, quietly return their papers to their pockets. I must confess that this was exactly my own predicament. But when we had had time to get from under the fascination of the right hon. Gentleman—when his speech appeared on the prosaic page of Hansard, we began to wonder how it was that it had made so profound an impression upon the House. And now, if I do not weary the House, I should like to state why (although I generally follow the right hon. Gentleman into the lobby) his line of argument upon that occasion does not appear to me to have been perfectly conclusive. The right hon. Gentleman, after having congratulated my hon. Friend upon his inflexible will in persevering with his Motion in the face of the adverse Report of his own Committee, proceeded to develop the argument upon which he evidently relied for the discomfiture of my hon. Friend. He said that the plan of my hon. Friend, if carried into execution, would create a gap of two and a half millions in the revenue, and he asked my hon. Friend how he proposed to fill up that gap. Now, if my hon. Friend had possessed the gift of prescience—if he could have foretold that the Government could by a scratch of the pen, without in the least impairing the efficiency of the services reduce the Estimates by a couple of millions, he would have possessed the key to a ready reply. But, of course my hon. Friend was ignorant of this fact. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman then was equally blind to it; because, if I remember rightly, it was at a subsequent period of the Session that those events occurred which brought sudden conviction to the minds of Ministers. And, Sir, I may say, in passing, that I shall be much surprised if the present Session should close without the pressure of events which will have the effect of carrying those convictions to a point which they have hitherto failed to reach. At that time, however, the right hon. Gentleman was unable to devise any means by which the gap could be filled up, except the imposition of an extra income tax of threepence in the pound. Now, it is wonderful how the fertility of resource of the right hon. Gentleman varies with circumstances. It reminds one of the fertility of the soil in some of the neighbouring counties. One moment the soil is deep and rich, unfathomable and inexhaustible.

Mr. Hubbard

Mr. Leatham

You mount a gentle eminence, and the fertility ceases. You are told that you have come upon the chalk. I have observed that when the right hon. Gentleman is preparing a budget his resources are inexhaustible, but when any one else proposes changes in our system of taxation which would result in a loss to the Exchequer, there is an end of the right hon. Gentleman's fertility of resource. We come at once upon the chalk. But on the supposition that all the other sources of revenue are already exhausted, and that a corresponding reduction in the Estimates is impossible; is it certain that we have so large a sum as two and a half millions to provide for by an extra income tax? My hon. Friend expects that the attempt to do justice to Schedule D will have a salutary effect upon the conscience of Schedule D, and that a large sum will be recouped through this resurrection of conscience. The right hon. Gentleman tells him that such an idea is altogether visionary. Now, so far as I am competent to form an opinion, I have formed one half way between that of the right hon. Gentleman and that of my hon. Friend. No doubt, when you have for years and years schooled men in duplicity and then proceed to set them a righteous example, you will find them better adepts in your first lesson than in your second; but I would beg the right hon. Gentleman to remember that a number of persons come every year for the first time under the operation of this tax, and that they, at all events, will not be tempted to commit fraud upon the specious plea that they do so in order to resist the fraudulent pressure of an unjust tax. Then there is the omission of Clause 133, as suggested by my hon. Friend. I believe that a large amount would be recovered from the omission of this clause, and that this additional advantage would accrue from its omission, namely, that it would hit large bankers and brewers—persons whom the right hon. Gentleman pursues with relentless hostility. But, Sir, I must protest against the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman draws a sharp line between the classes taxed under the different schedules. He tells us one moment that it is impossible to tax different classes differently in this country, as you might in India, because they all blend imperceptibly into one another, and the next he draws a sharp line between them, as though they were hopelessly distinct. It seems never to have occurred to the right hon. Gentleman that rich bankers and brewers may be taxed under more than one schedule. It seems never to have occurred to him that rich bankers and brewers are in all probability great landowners, great fundholders, and great holders of railway shares. And so universal is the application of this remark, that I believe rich bankers, brewers, merchants, and manufacturers would not gain a shilling by the scheme of my hon. Friend; for they would lose with one hand what they gained with the other. It is not for them, therefore, we demand justice, but for the 400,000 industrial and professional incomes, compared with which the incomes of rich bankers and brewers are but as a drop in the ocean. Well, Sir, from both these sources we should probably gain no inconsiderable sum—but the probability is that we should still have to provide for a deficiency of two millions, should the plan of my hon. Friend come into operation. Now, referring to the statistics, for which my hon. Friend moved at the close of last Session, I find that the distribution of an extra income tax to cover this amount would raise the tax on Schedule A to a fraction above 10d. in the pound, and lower the tax on Schedule E (the farmer's) to rather more than 7½d.—and blending these two rates together, as we have a right to do on the supposition that this tax will be perpetual, we shall find that the tax upon land will be raised from 9d. to 9½d. Now, I do not think that the imposition of this odd halfpenny is likely to breed—as the right hon. Gentleman appears to anticipate—and mark how the right hon. Gentleman piles up agony for the territorial interest. He tells them that, owing to the fact that most estates are more or less encumbered, and that the tax is levied upon the gross income, they pay already 2d. in the pound on the average more than they ought to pay. Well, I admit that this is a grievance. But what is its cure? Has the right hon. Gentleman proposed any? No, but my hon. Friend has. His proposition that net income alone should be taxed is the cure. But the right hon. Gentleman tells hon. Members opposite, that if they pass the measure of my hon. Friend, they will find that it will be materially improved upon in subsequent years. The right hon. Gentleman tortures the confiding imaginations of hon. Members with vague spectres of spoliation and confiscation to come. Now, why does the right hon. Gentleman do this? Because the right hon. Gentleman wishes to convince hon. Members that this scheme of my hon. Friend's, if it be not a deep-laid plot to destroy the social fabric, is at least the commencement of a strenuous struggle between the classes. But who is it who is the first to raise the cry of class against class? my hon. Friend or the right hon. Gentleman? Why I remember that two years ago the right hon. Gentleman, two or three times on the eve of a division, informed hon. Gentlemen opposite with a reiteration and an emphasis from which there could be no escape, that the struggle was not between himself and my hon. Friend, but between Schedule A and Schedule D. Nothing can be more adroit, nothing can be more admirable from a rhetorical point of view than the way in which the right hon. Gentleman deprecates the spirit of discord while steadily infusing it. But I think that the right hon. Gentleman pushed his happy intrepidity to the extreme when, after having proved to hon. Gentlemen opposite that it was their interest to reject the scheme of my hon. Friend, after having appealed to every selfish and sordid feeling, he wound up his speech by a peroration in which he besought them to have the manliness and virtue to vote against my hon. Friend—the manliness and virtue to vote in strict accordance with their personal interests! But it is not only the landed interest which will be unfairly taxed under the plan of my hon. Friend. There is the public creditor. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that Sir Robert Peel and Mr. Pitt were of opinion that to tax Schedule C in full, and the other Schedules not in full, would be equivalent to laying a special tax upon the funds. But Mr. Wilson, a high authority upon matters of finance, and a more recent authority than either Sir Robert Peel or Mr. Pitt, arrived at an opposite conclusion. In his memorandum—part of which I hold in my hand—he proposes to tax the fundholders' income at 7d. while he taxes traders' profits at 4d. Now, there is another argument which is a great favourite with the right hon. Gentleman, and it is this:—That because there is a great disparity in the relative value of incomes in Schedule D, make what abatements we may, we shall still leave an immense amount of relative injustice unredressed. The right hon. Gentleman, in proof of this assertion, compares an income worth a few years' purchase, with that derived from a bank—a business which he estimates to be worth twenty-five years' purchase. Now, I feel infinitely obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for the high opinion which he has expressed as to the solidity of the kind of business in which I happen to be engaged. But will the right hon. Gentleman think me very ungracious and ungrateful if I say that his estimate appears to me to be so wild, so rash, so remote from the truth, that I am perfectly at a loss to conceive upon what grounds the right hon. Gentleman has arrived at so incredible an assumption. Does the right hon. Gentleman ask the House to believe that a capitalist would invest his capital in a business involving no inconsiderable risk, and, as we flatter ourselves, requiring no inconsiderable skill, upon such wretched terms as only to return him 4 per cent? It so happens that I was asked only the other day by a friend of mine (one of the most eminent private bankers in the North of England) at how many years' purchase I should put a banker's business? I at once replied that there was no banker's business in the country worth more than ten years' purchase. My friend demurred at my estimate, "Say rather five or six," said he. Now, if there be any truth in this estimate, what becomes of the argument of the right hon. Gentleman which is based upon the immense disparity in value of incomes in Schedule D? But I wonder that the use of such an argument did not suggest to the right hon. Gentleman a test by which to measure the iniquity of this tax. If it be so unjust to tax at the same rate incomes from professions worth five years' and incomes from professions supposed to be worth twenty-five years' purchase respectively, how much more unjust must it be to tax at the same rate incomes like that of a lawyer, which the right hon. Gentleman tells us is not worth a single shilling in case of his death, and incomes like those derived from land worth thirty or forty years', and in many parts of the county in which I reside fifty years' purchase? Now, there is only one more argument employed by the right hon. Gentleman to which I wish to reply before I sit down—namely, that which is based upon the proposition that Schedule D has no claim to an abatement because many persons in Schedule D take care to do themselves justice in the process of self-assessment, that is, by falsifying the returns. And first, I would recall the admission of the right hon. Gentleman made two years ago, when he stated his—

“Red ruin and the breaking up of laws,”

Mr. Leatham

"Conviction that a large portion of those who pay under Schedule D pay every farthing that they ought, and in many cases of doubt rule the doubt against themselves."

And I would ask the right hon. Gentleman what kind of justice he is doing to these meritorious persons who, rather than evade the unjust impositions of the State, conspire with the right hon. Gentlemen in defrauding themselves, and who, in return for the exercise of a lofty morality, are told by the right hon. Gentleman, "It is all very well for you to talk about the morality of your class, but we know that in the folds of your schedule lurks all the roguery in the country?" But what is the right hon. Gentleman in effect saying to those who do themselves justice at the expense of truth and of the State? Is he not saying this?—"We are aware that you falsify the returns, and upon this fact we base our defence. We incorporate your falsehood into our system. Your falsehood and our injustice stand there face to face, confronting and neutralizing one another. What matter, so long as practical injustice is the result?" Let me tell the right hon. Gentleman that by persisting in the use of this argument, and persisting in a system of unjust taxation, admitting of the safe and ready remedy which he indicates, he is undermining the morality of a class upon whose high sense of honour, more perhaps than upon that of any other, the credit and reputation of this country in the eyes of foreign nations depend. And let me venture to remind him that the House of Commons is no mere vestry of tax-makers, but that we are supposed to be the guardians of the public morality, and the source of public justice, and that in this high character it becomes us to exhibit to the nation at all times no equivocal—I had almost said no disreputable—example, but especially when, as now, we were seeking to impose an obligation—abnormal, odious in itself, altogether removed from that public observation which is the safeguard of public morality—ought we to assume an attitude, the justice of which does not depend for its vindication upon the refinements of reasoning, but appeals at once to the public conscience—to the profound and intuitive instincts of our countrymen.

Motion made, and Question proposed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, there are certain acts, the repetition of which enables a man to cast aside whatever degree of bashfulness or shyness he may have previously exhibited in performing them. I am sorry to say that the repetition of the same annual speech on the same annual Motion is not one of those acts; and I most sincerely state to the House that it is with some degree of bashfulness that I feel myself compelled, by the Motion of my hon. Friend, to revert to the discussion of a subject, which, as far as it can be opened out in a debate of this kind—and I am one of those who think it is not likely thus to be very fully opened out—is, to a certain extent, of a threadbare character as regards the principal topics and arguments it embraces. My hon. Friend appears here as a reformer of the income tax, and not only as a reformer of the income tax, but likewise as the advocate and champion of a particular plan. He does not appear as a reformer of the income tax in general, for no man has more mercilessly than my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham cast aside, rejected, and repudiated the plans of every previous reformer. He enjoys, indeed, an absolute certainty that the plan which he himself proposes is, in all its essential parts, perfect and invulnerable; and if he could but convey to the minds of others that undoubting sentiment with which he himself regards it, certainly he would lead us at once to the adoption of his scheme. But I must be permitted to say this, that while I resist the project of my hon. Friend as being, in regard to its impracticable and visionary character, on a footing with the other schemes which he joins me in repudiating—nay, as being a scheme much more vulnerable in argument than those which he rejected because he found them so defective—I do not stand on the proposition that the structure of the income tax is to be defended as being, in all its parts, entirely agreeable to justice. It is not possible, I believe, to devise a tax of this kind which shall not be full of inequalities and anomalies. Still, the inequalities and anomalies of the income tax, as they now exist, have at any rate this advantage—an advantage which even the faults of every established tax possess—namely, that they are in some degree understood, and that the back has, in some degree, adapted itself to the burden. But the faults, the anomalies, and as, I think, in most cases the injustices, which my hon. Friend proposes to introduce, have the additional disadvantage of novelty—a novelty which, to the speculative mind, may constitute an attraction, but which, if it even were the fate of my hon. Friend to have to propose his plan as a practical measure for the adoption of the House, he would find, when once he had to consider it as a question of legislation with a view to the supply of the public necessities, that to shift anomalies and injustice from one side to another is not merely not to remedy an evil, but to exchange an existing evil for another still worse and more difficult to bear.

Sir, my hon. Friend has submitted to us two Resolutions, and he proposes them with the same confidence as he projected them last year. But I must again point out to him that upon which I have dwelt, when formerly engaged in argument against him—namely, the predicament in which he stands with reference to recorded authorities on this question. He spoke himself of an entire misconstruction of principles and misconception of objects on the part of those with whom he has to contend. But, at any rate, this must be admitted, that on a matter of such a character authority is of great importance, because the authority of men in such a case is not a naked and bare claim to domineer over the minds of others, but is the expressed result of the experience of those who have come nearest to this question, who have most closely and systematically examined it, and who have been obliged to adapt their conduct in this House to the principles which they found practically applicable to the subject with the least amount of objection. In that sense my hon. Friend does not doubt that the two greatest Finance Ministers of this country—if I may presume to form or pass an opinion upon our Finance Ministers—Mr. Pitt and Sir Robert Peel—have both considered this question, and have both left the tax as a uniform income tax, not, indeed, as the image of perfection in our fiscal system, but as that form on which, as wise, prudent, and practical men, they found it necessary to take their stand. But the question has also a more recent history, and that history is somewhat remarkable. A Committee was appointed in 1850 to consider, not the plan of my hon. Friend, but a plan which so far agreed with it that it aimed at a reconstruction of the tax in favour of those classes whom, at the expense of other classes, he now proposes to relieve. Now, what was the history of that Committee?

The inquiry was voted by the House, if not unanimously, by at least a large majority. Every one was desirous of inquiry, and those who projected the investigation made the most sanguine and confident announcement that they would prove their case before it. The Committee sat; it examined the matter patiently; it ended by making no Report. That plan entirely broke down. Nor was that all. There were Gentlemen of eminence in this House who went into that Committee completely wedded to the plan of reconstruction, and who came out of it either entire converts to the principle of the present tax, or, at all events, greatly shaken in their adhesion to the scheme for reforming it. I have been told—and I may be contradicted if I am wrong—that my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Mr. Cobden), who entered that Committee with the utmost confidence in the practicability of the re-adjustment scheme, was entirely shaken in his belief as to its feasibility by hearing the evidence adduced. And it is perfectly well known that another Gentleman, then a Member of this House, and not second to anybody in his knowledge of, and fitness for dealing with, politico-economical questions—Mr. Ricardo—went into the Committee of 1850 prepossessed in favour of that scheme, and came out of it convinced that its agitation was mischievous and its adoption impracticable. Well, we had another Committee, on the urgent application of my hon. Friend, in 1861. How was it composed? My hon. Friend himself will not deny that which I am now about to assert. He did not lose his Report. His scheme was not rejected by that Committee, because it was a Committee which went to its inquiry with foregone conclusions adverse to his proposals. Some of the Members were opposed to the present mode of levying the tax; others were favourable to it; but the majority depended upon minds which were entirely impartial. Yet how did that inquiry end? By the adoption of a Report wholly hostile, to and condemnatory of, the scheme of my hon. Friend. And the reason why that Report was carried was because the majority who agreed to it consisted of men who were brought to their conclusions in consequence of their labours and inquiries on that Committee. Sir, these are facts of great importance. It is very easy to discuss a matter of this kind in the House of Commons, but something is due, in point of authority, to the conclusions of those who have been selected by the House for the purpose of examining in great detail a particular question of great intricacy and complexity. And when it is found that Committee after Committee closes its investigations with a mind more adverse to such schemes as my hon. Friend's than that with which they began them, that is a fact of great significance, which not all the ingenuity of my hon. Friend can shake. And although I do not pretend for one moment to say that the House is to be governed by the authority either of Ministers or of Committees, in opposition to its own conviction, yet it is an element of great weight in the case, which it would be highly for the interest of my hon. Friend's argument if he could eliminate from it, but the force of which I think we must all feel it difficult reasonably to disregard.

My hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) made a very ingenious speech, but how does he know what may happen to himself? Other Gentlemen, ingenious like him, and with the same leanings, looking at the question from a distance, have thought to reform the income tax; but when they came to look at it more narrowly, have found, not that the present tax stood free from fault and blame of almost every kind, but that it was unwise to encourage the agitation of schemes which in themselves are impracticable, and tended to excite hopes and expectations that cannot be realized. Now, my hon. Friend, rejected by his own Committee, and having himself rejected the favourite schemes of reformers in the preceding Committee, after having had his Motion likewise rejected by a large majority in the House, comes forward with unabated confidence, and again submits his propositions; and I must say my hon. Friend, as he adds to the numbers of his campaigns, together with his experience—I had almost said together with his misfortunes—exhibits no small increase of hardihood. This evening he has adopted a much bolder tone than on any former occasion. He has undertaken to show us that there cannot be a greater mistake than to suppose that his proposition is favourable to the great capitalists, bankers, merchants, and brewers. That, says my hon. Friend, is all a mistake. Those gentlemen have all property invested, not, as we all thought, in their business, but in the funds and railway shares, where it is subject to the highest rate of tax. My hon. Friend is so modest with respect to Schedule D that he will not allow himself to assume the smallest credit as a benefactor to that unfortunate interest; and when he deals with Schedule A, he adopts quite an opposite tone. He says there cannot be a greater mistake than to suppose that I am going to augment the burden on Schedule A. He quotes an entirely impossible case of a gentleman with £800 a year, derived from landed estate, and that £720 of it may be put out on the interest of a mortgage. I certainly am not conversant with such a case, but he says, "This is a most cruel case. I have shown that under the present law such a man, instead of paying 9d. in the pound, may really pay 1s. 6d.; whereas under the plan I propose he will only pay 10½d." Let us, then, try that issue. Does my hon. Friend admit or not that his is a plan to relieve one class at the expense of another? If he says that he does not impose unjust burdens on Schedule A, I fully admit he is not half so unjust to Schedule A as to some others. I don't know on what principle he has been pleased to select some descriptions of income which are generally considered most fluctuating and uncertain, in order to smite them with the weight of his right hand and lay on them the full weight of the tax. In his printed paper railway and canal property is to pay the highest tax. Canal property! Canal property, under railway competition, has undergone severe pressure and reverse, but he selects it for agreeable prominence in taxation, while he makes a deduction of one-third from every flourishing business in the City of London. Then with regard to railway property—I hope there is no railway shareholder in this House—if there be, he will judge what kind of remedial scheme that is which leaves railway property taxed as now at the full rate, and puts an extra tax on it, in order to give relief of 33 per cent to every flourishing business in the City of London. Is the income from railway property such a very flourishing income? I trust there is no person connected with the Great Western Railway present. Its dividend took a great jump upwards; but something of this kind lately happened, that the shareholders, enjoying an income of £3 per cent one half-year, the next it dwindled to 5s. per cent; but my hon. Friend has no mercy for such an income, and he proposes to levy a sur-tax for the benefit of those who are to enjoy a reduction of 25 per cent. My hon. Friend assumes an over-modesty with respect to Schedule D, and a degree of confidence, of innocence, towards Schedule A, of which he is hardly entitled to claim the benefit. His inference meant, if it meant anything, that he would give an effective reduction on Schedule A. Is that so, or is it not? Let us understand. Is the plan to relieve everybody out of some bottomless purse possessed by my hon. Friend, but of which no one else is cognizant; or is it the old vulgar plan of putting his hand into the pocket of one man to place the contents in that of another? That is my humble translation of my hon. Friend's speech, and it is very considerably supported by the figures and papers he has laid on the table. We have heard his speech to-night; how great a benefactor he is to Schedule A. Well, the amount of tax paid in 1860-1 under Schedule A was £2,048,000, and the amount of the tax which would have been paid under Schedule A, if the scheme of my hon. Friend had been in operation, is £2,308,000, showing an augmentation of £260,000, or about 12½ per cent. That is the plan; but do not be mystified about the amount of expenses and repairs and charges of maintenance. That is the net result presented by my hon. Friend. Schedule A actually paid, under the present cruel and grinding tax, £2,048,000; and if his plan had been in operation, it would have paid £2,308,000—an increase of £260,000—for the relief and benefit of other parties. My hon. Friend worked himself up by his dissertation on the three years' average clause till he appeared to arrive at the conclusion that the present law was by far too much in favour of those who pay the tax under Schedule D. Let us see how he ought thus modestly to disclaim the character of benefactor to Schedule D. I revert to his own simple figures. Schedule D in 1861, when the tax was 10d., paid £3,613,000; and if his plan had been in operation, Schedule D would have paid £3,049,000, or less by £564,000 than it actually paid. I therefore think I have established in favour of my hon. Friend, first of all, that he has somewhat overstated his claims to the gratitude of the taxpayers in Schedule A, and that he has greatly understated the grounds on which he is fairly entitled to be considered a benefactor to those paying under Schedule D.

Let us now come to the principle on which he founds his proposition; but first of all let me say, that what I have stated does not, in the least degree, exhibit the full amount of anomalies and cases of injustice my hon. Friend proposes to inflict on the country. Under Schedule, A he says will make an allowance of one-twelfth or $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent; let us see the meaning of that. Some owners of land have properties in which the repairs of agricultural holdings are very heavy and go far beyond one-eighth, but many other holders have properties on which they do not pay a shilling for repairs. The way the hon. Gentleman would remove anomalies is, that whether a man pays 20 per cent for repairs or nothing, a deduction of $8\frac{1}{2}$ per cent shall be made all round to him who pays nothing as well as to him who pays much. If he could grant that deduction to one without taking it from another, there would be something to say for such a mode of dealing, but that is not and cannot be the case. If you make a deduction all round, the meaning is, that to benefit one man you must tax somebody else. The general upshot of my hon. Friend's plan is, that he adds rather more than one-eighth to the payments of those who pay the tax upon land or houses. Every man upon the average who now pays £8 would then pay £9; but the difference would be, that while as a class those who now pay £8 would then pay £9, many of that class would still only pay £8, because the increase of the tax upon them would be counterbalanced by an arbitrary deduction, while others of the same class, instead of paying £9, would have to pay £10; and this immense inequality my hon. Friend seeks to introduce by a machinery as arbitrary in character as it is unsatisfactory and anomalous in results. But he says, he rests upon one main proposition as the basis of his plan—that is, he aims to relieve what he calls industrial incomes. I will come to the justice of that principle by-and-by; but upon what considerations does he found it? His argument is, "I will relieve industrial incomes, because under the law, as it now stands, the very same property which is taxed in one year as profits of trade is taxed in another year as capital, with reference to the fruits it produces." But, Sir, is that a reason why the income tax should be reconstructed? Because in 1863 you tax as profits in trade what in 1864, so far as unexpended, appears as capital, yielding fruits subject to taxation—I say, that is the principle of our law as to property in general. The law of this country makes property pass through preliminary taxation at the point when it comes into the possession of the holder, and then subjects it the year after, and every year after, to taxation in respect of its fruits. If a man makes £50,000 in trade in 1863, my hon. Friend says that ought not to be taxed in respect of its fruits as capital in 1864. But supposing a man inherits a property worth £50,000 in the Funds in 1863, he pays Probate Duty, Legacy Duty, or Succession Duty. It is taxed as capital in 1863, it remains in his possession, yielding income, in 1864, which is taxed again. The main reason which my hon. Friend urges for breaking up the income tax and substituting a scheme of his own is because we apply to savings made in trade the same rule which we apply—whenever the law can apply it—to any other property when it comes into possession of the holders. I think, therefore, that my hon. Friend has no ground for substituting his plan for the existing system, and the principle of his plan, I must say, appears to me to be fraught with danger.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

The hon. Member for Huddersfield seems to think that the existence of a surplus would solve the question; and that the exception I took to my hon. Friend's proposition is simply that we had not a surplus, and therefore had not the money wherewith to do justice. I did mention the non-existence of a surplus as a difficulty for my hon. Friend to deal with, but not as any part of the difficulty I felt in acceding to his proposition. If there be a surplus—and it does not become me to say now whether there be or not—but if there be a surplus of taxation, we ought to deal with this question upon precisely the same footing as if there were no surplus—that is, we should do justice between the several classes of taxpayers of the country. Now, as to the practicability of the proposed scheme, my hon. Friend has, I think, done an involuntary injustice to the late Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue. He said that Mr. Pressley, although he made difficulties at first, and although he was a most violent Conservative in all matters relating to revenue, yet such was the force and truth of my hon. Friend's plan, that at the close of the inquiry he withdrew all his objections, and had no more to make. My hon. Friend mistakes the character of Mr. Pressley, perhaps, because he has not been privileged, as many of us have, to enjoy the intimate friendship of that gentleman. What is the value of the term "conservative" as applied to politics, is not a question for discussion at present; but as applied to the administration of the revenue laws, never was error more ludicrous than to describe Mr. Pressley as eminently entitled to the epithet, on the ground of his being wedded to existing schemes and existing laws. For six years I have had the closest and most intimate intercourse with Mr. Pressley upon all matters relating to the revenue, and never in my life did I see a man more wholly free from all vestige of prejudice, more eager for improvements, or more desirous to carry them out. He never withdrew his objections to my hon. Friend's plan, because he never made any. Does my hon. Friend think that Mr. Pressley was so young in his duties as to commit himself in a reply to some ingenious question of my hon. Friend put with the hope of obtaining the sanction of Mr. Pressley's authority to his views, or that he was a man to put himself in the place of the Members of this House, and dictate to them the principles upon which the tax should be levied? All he said was "if the House chooses to enact a plan, we can carry it out," and there is no doubt of that; but I venture to say that the plan of my hon. Friend will not soon be submitted to any Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue to carry into effect.

But what is the principle of my hon. Friend? He claims privilege for what he chooses to call industrial incomes. There is some degree of fallacy in that expression. Industry in this country is at present exempt from the income tax. I do not know that that exemption can be said to rest upon any very broad or clear principle, but, for my own part, I think it may be justified by two considerations:—First, that I believe it to be visionary to dream of levying income tax from the bulk of the labouring classes; and next, because, as far as I am able to judge, under the system of taxation now existing the labouring man, although exempt from income tax, pays at least a very fair, perhaps a rather full, share of taxation; but, as far as the income tax is concerned, industry, properly so called, except a limited portion of the more highly skilled mechanics, is exempt. My hon. Friend means the profits of educated men in the professions, or some of them, and he likewise means the exercise of industry and intelligence in combination with capital. I want to know upon what principle my hon. Friend gets to this particular distinction, as different amounts of taxation are to be taken from different people not according to the revenues they possess, which is an intelligible principle, not according to their poverty, which is an intelligible principle, not according to their wealth or poverty, but according to the degree in which industry and capital are mixed up together in making up the income. My hon. Friend propounds this as the foundation of his system. He confidently puts it forward as a self-evident proposition; but, in my opinion, a more dangerous principle it is not possible to conceive. Those whom he desires to relieve are the class whose fortunes are on the most rapid state of progress and increase. Those who are needy in proportion to the station they occupy my hon. Friend leaves untouched, or rather, he subjects them to additional burdens in order to give a great relief from taxation to a class whose fortunes are in the most rapid state of augmentation. But how does he think, when he has established his claim on behalf of what he calls industrial incomes, he will be able to shut out those who are disposed to recommend other principles? He will, no doubt, be shocked when I say that in my opinion more is to be said in favour of graduated taxation than for his plan. A graduated taxation recognises poverty in one class and overgrown wealth in another, and justice demands that one should pay less and the other more. There is something rather plausible in that principle, more so than in my hon. Friend's plan. My hon. Friend is very sensitive when the microscope is applied to the examination of his scheme, but that is really the only way in which to divest it of the plausibilities in which it is wrapped. He takes a widow, with £200 a year from the Funds, with six children to educate, to train, and to start in the world, and he takes the case of a great merchant—I will not say brewer or banker, as there seems to be some objection to specifying those flourishing classes—but to a great merchant, with £20,000 a year, he grants a relief to the extent of one-third, and in order to do that he adds 25 per cent to the burden of the poor widow. I protest against the principle of my hon. Friend. It is one, in my opinion, which, when carefully examined, is much less plausible, and at least as dangerous as the principle of graduating taxation. The hon. Member for Huddersfield says I appealed last year to the hon. Gentlemen opposite. He is much more fresh in his recollection of that speech than I am, having done me the honour to refer to it; but I am not aware that I appealed to the hon. Gentlemen opposite in particular. I appealed to the whole House, and I trust the whole House will have the justice and the manliness now to repeat the Vote which they gave on that occasion. Some justice and some manliness I think it requires, because I do not deny the faults and flaws of the present income tax. I do not deny that a feeling has existed, does exist, and I believe will always exist among considerable portions of the community, in the direction of the Motion which my hon. Friend has made. Neither do I deny that such a feeling is entirely natural. But I do say, that when the real merits of the case are examined, when investigation is made of broad practical issues, such as I have only endeavoured in one or two cases to exemplify, but which were more fully and sharply brought out before my hon. Friend's Committee, the danger involved in my hon. Friend's principle will be apparent. The danger, moreover, will be obvious of agitating subjects like this, and of substituting vague expectations in the minds of the community—expectations which only end in taking money from one man to give it to another—for those rational hopes of reduction which never can be realized by my hon. Friend's plan, but the realization of which must entirely depend on the adoption of judicious economy, and the consequent application of sound principles to the relief of the public.

MR. HUBBARD asked the House to consider the position in which the subject was now left. He had met with a distinct denial and disproof every count in the indictment which had been urged against his plan of adjustment. His right hon. Friend in his speech had not even attempted to rebut his argument or invalidate his facts; but abandoning the logical contest, he had endeavoured to discredit his (Mr. Hubbard's) scheme by showing that all former schemes had failed. The only other scheme he had heard of was the one called Mr. Hume's—which he agreed with most practical men, with the officials, and with his right hon. Friend, in thinking impracticable; but surely one failure is no proof that amendment is unattainable. His right hon. Friend repelled the proposed adjustment by pleading that neither Pitt nor Peel had attempted one; but is no improvement in fiscal legislation to take place which Pitt or Peel neglected or ignored? Pitt was a great man, but is the policy of the author of the Sinking Fund to be a rule for us? Peel was a great man; but had he died a few years earlier, the Chancellor might have been quoting his authority now in support of a Protective system. The inequalities of the present tax are not denied, but we are told by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the back must adjust itself to the burden—we must not hope to shake off our chains, but we are to find comfort in the expectation that our limbs will become callous to the pressure of the galling chain. I find, Sir, nothing more to reply to, and I must leave my Resolution to the decision of the House.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Question put.

"That, in the opinion of this House, the incidence of an Income Tax touching the products of invested property should fall upon net Income, and that the net amounts of industrial earnings should, previous to assessment, be subject to such an abatement as may equitably adjust the burden thrown upon intelligence and skill as compared with property."

The House divided:—Ayes 70; Noes 118; Majority 48.

APPROPRIATION OF SUPPLIES.

RESOLUTIONS.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU, in moving Resolutions with reference to the Appropriation of Supplies, said, that in 1861 he had moved the same as that which was now contained in his first Resolution. In 1862, when moving the appointment of a Committee of Accounts, he had strongly urged the abolition of the system of transfers which took place under the transfer clause in the Appropriation Act. Both these Motions had been unsuccessful. But now, as the blue-book of the Public Accounts Committee had fully borne out all that he had said upon those occasions, he trusted that the House would not deem it presumptuous in him to press the same Resolutions again upon them. The Appropriation Act was the result of the grand struggle which had ended with the Revolution of 1688. It ought, therefore, to have been maintained unaltered until the present day; no changes at least should have been made in it recklessly and without due consideration, or through carelessness and neglect. Notwithstanding this, many changes had been made in the Bill, including the insertion of the clause which empowered transfers, and the alteration which had been made in the year 1858. With regard to the latter, the Committee of Public Accounts reported as follows:—

“The subsequent alteration was made (in 1858) without the attention of the House being called to the point. The Bill was not printed, and, as your Committee are informed, the change was made through inadvertence. By the alteration the intended limitation was entirely removed.” [Second Report, Public Accounts, 1862, page v.]

This was explained by Mr. Anderson in his evidence. Until the year 1858 the army grants used to appear in two aggregate sums, between the Votes of which no transfers could take place. In that year they were massed together. It was said that this was done by mistake; but the mistake had not been rectified, and therefore the sphere of transfers had remained extended. The Report of the Committee continued thus—

“Your Committee recommend that the Appropriation Bill, and the Appropriation Clause, should be printed and distributed in time for consideration, before the Bill passes through Committee of the House.”

Until the year 1854 the insertion of the appropriation clause had been made the subject of an Instruction to the Committee on the Bill, and was therefore necessarily inserted in the Appropriation Bill. In that year, however, this practice was discontinued. The result was, that in the second Session of 1857 the appropriation clause was omitted and the transfer clause was retained. In the first Session of the year 1859, the appropriation clause appeared as the 18th clause, and the transfer clause was omitted. In the second Session of the same year the appropriation clause was omitted, while the transfer clause appeared, as the 23rd clause. Last year the Bill was printed, but was not distributed, while certain alterations were made without the sanction or cognizance of the House. One of those alterations provided that deficiencies should only be “temporarily defrayed” out of surpluses; and another enforced that the representations made to the Treasury for leave to transfer should be “laid before the House within one month after the accounts had been sent to the Audit Board.” He trusted that his first Resolution would meet with the approval of the House, seeing that it was in the same terms as the Report of the Committee of Public Accounts. He was not urging a technical matter of detail, but sought to enforce the constitutional principle, that the appropriation of supplies was peculiarly the function of the House; and which, considering that the struggle to establish this principle had lasted half a century, should ever be looked upon as a sacred duty by the Representatives of the People. His second Resolution referred to the power of transferring the surplus of one Vote to provide for a deficiency under another; or, in other words, appropriating balances to meet excesses. The clause which authorized this operation had been first introduced in the Act of 1846. This clause he would speak of as the 29th clause, because this power was contained in the 29th clause of the Act which was laid before the Committee of Public Accounts, and was spoken of, by the witnesses, under that name. With reference to that clause he affirmed these three propositions—that the object with which it had been introduced had never been attained; that it tended to increase the public expenditure, and was otherwise most injurious; and that no inconvenience could result from its omission.

The object of this clause was the same as that which Sir James Graham sought in 1832, in order to secure a strict appropriation—namely, to secure to the Treasury a control over the Departments, so as to prevent them appropriating money contrary to the wishes of Parliament. Mr. Anderson had stated in his evidence, that the origin of Clause 29 was the Report of Sir W. Herries’ Committee; the intention of which was that—

“Treasury Control might be brought in aid of Parliamentary Control, so as to prevent an excess on any Vote.”

This, moreover, had been recommended by that Committee only on the supposition of there being no Committee of Public Accounts to inquire into any excesses upon the Votes. This object had not been obtained. To this every one of the witnesses had borne testimony. Sir Richard Bromley said (153). “My own opinion is, that it (the check of the Treasury) is a mere matter of form, and that it would be better dispensed with.” Mr. Arbuthnot (1104-9) stated that “the authority given to the Treasury has degenerated into a mere matter of form.” “The Treasury check has not so worked as to be successful in its object.” The Duke of Somerset allowed (1327) that "the control of the Treasury to deny the transfer is and must be merely nominal." In fact, Colonel Greene (230) did not know any case in which the Treasury have refused to give their assent. The Duke of Somerset continued (1447)—

"The Treasury have, for a great many years, been trying (under Clause 29) to control the expenditure, and keep the Naval Estimates in their right position, but have totally and entirely failed."

Mr. Arbuthnot stated, that the Admiralty "utterly declined to acknowledge the authority of the Treasury," and tried systematically to set the Treasury at defiance. He might mention two examples. The first was the transfer of £250,000, which had been voted for the building of iron ships, to the purchase of stores. The Treasury were never asked for their sanction to this transfer, and never knew of it for upwards of a year afterwards; and at last it was made a matter of mere verbal communication between the present Secretary to the Admiralty and Mr. Laing, who was then Secretary to the Treasury. In the same year the store Vote was exceeded by £424,651; which was also met by a transfer; and here again the sanction of the Treasury was not once asked. Application for leave to transfer was, in fact, never made until five days before the accounts were sent in to the Audit Board, when there remained no longer sufficient time to make any inquiries. Such instances showed that the clause had entirely failed in the object for which it had been framed. He now passed to the second proposition, and would show that this 29th clause, or rather the power of transfer which it gave, had operated most injuriously for the public service. He would show this in six different ways. The clause had a very injurious effect, because, in the first place, the expenditure had thereby been greatly increased. Sir Richard Bromley had, in fact, affixed a stigma to the clause by calling it a mere "cover to expenditure." The power of transfer had been created in 1846, and the Duke of Somerset stated that "the next year (1847) the expenditure exceeded the Estimates by £454,000, thus showing that the balance had been overthrown." Mr. Anderson had referred to the same cause, the well-known fact that the expenditure in 1862 was three times as great as that of 1832. As an example, he might mention that the gun-boat slips at Haslar were constructed and the expenses met by a transfer, and "Parliament was thereby committed to a vast expense without any previous sanction." So also the £12,000 given to the German settlers at the Cape was met by a transfer, having been given without the sanction of Parliament. This had been stated by the Secretary at War on March 9.

Lord Robert Montagu

Secondly, the abolition of the power of transfer, or the expunging of Clause 29, would reduce expenditure. This might be deduced as a corollary from the preceding statement; but he preferred to bring forward independent testimony to substantiate it. Mr. Anderson, who was principal clerk at the Treasury, said (1716) that—

"Whenever you require those great departments to go to Parliament to vote all their deficiencies, you will very much reduce the amount of those deficiencies."

The Duke of Somerset allowed (1400) that "having to come before Parliament for a Supplementary Estimate," would tend to "check the expenditure." But Mr. Gladstone asserted (1636) that "at present there is a power of final adjustment without coming to Parliament at all." And he continued to state that there were many transactions which the Departments would not enter into at all, if they knew that the case must come before Parliament. The reason why the expunging of the 29th clause would reduce the expenditure was very plain; and this introduced the third head—namely, that the power of transfer prevented the Departments coming to Parliament for money; which was another very injurious effect of that clause. The Secretary for War said, that "if the clause were repealed, the Departments would have to go to Parliament for every excess," and added, that "the real check undoubtedly was the vote by Parliament." Colonel Greene stated, that the different Departments always took care to "have a surplus in order to prevent having to go to Parliament." Fourthly, the 29th clause was very injurious, because the system of making transfers tended to produce a laxity in the Estimates; and this laxity in the Estimates produced surpluses and then transfers. These evils thus acted and reacted on each other in ever increasing ratio; and caused an ever-widening circle of vicious expenditure. This had been plainly stated in the evidence of Mr. Arbuthnot; and Mr. Anderson, had said that the Departments were tempted to make surpluses, and were then induced, by the possession of a surplus, to incur expenditure which they would never incur otherwise; but if no power of transfer existed, and the Departments had to go to Parliament for deficiencies, they would "estimate every service at its proper amount." Fifthly, the power of transfer not only enabled the Departments to avoid coming before Parliament, but also operated most injuriously in entirely defeating the knowledge of Parliament. The Duke of Somerset (1464) said, that "under the existing system, Parliament may vote a vast sum of money for the conveyance of troops, and may find that a large portion of it is spent in stores." Colonel Greene (358) mentioned an instance in which money voted for barracks at Plymouth was spent on works at Hong Kong, which Parliament had never sanctioned, nor even heard of; "so that" to use his own words, "the knowledge of Parliament was thus defeated." And Mr. Arbuthnot (842) said, that payment for salaries might go on without even the Treasury knowing of it. This they did by applying it out of the Vote for Works. Thus, "the Surveyor of Coast Guard Buildings" was an office which was never known of until discovered by accident; for his salary had never appeared in the accounts, but was paid by a transfer from some of the Votes. The Duke of Somerset (1279-1286) confessed that, while Parliament was sitting, the money voted for iron ships was spent in buying timber. He allowed that he "did this on his own responsibility," he "thought it the right thing to do." This line of conduct he had determined on while Parliament was sitting, and yet he had never mentioned it to Parliament. It must be remembered that he had already "taken a Vote, of £722,000 for timber, which was all he could get" from Parliament. To wind up this statement, he confessed that he had determined not to let Parliament know anything about it, as long as "Parliament could take any action." There was also another head under which the 29th clause had operated most injuriously. The Government were induced, owing to it, to ask for a larger sum than they required for certain Votes which were known to be popular with the House; while they took less than was necessary for others which were unpopular; so that the House was by that means actually deceived in two ways:—First, they were persuaded that some much-desired object would receive the advantage which they so profusely granted: and, secondly, they were induced to believe that no more would be spent on some undesirable object than they chose to give. It was well the House should know that it was the practice of Governments to obtain money under false pretences (for he could designate the practice by no milder term). Mr. Arbuthnot, for instance, in his evidence (670, &c.) had said—

"There was a popular Vote obtained for a Naval Reserve, amounting to £100,000; and I apprehend that Parliament would not have placed that £100,000 at the disposal of the Admiralty for any other object. . . . Not above £12,000 was spent for that purpose; . . . and the rest of that Vote was applied to purchasing stores. I do not think it was an honest expenditure."

Again (830)—

"There is one thing to be always guarded against, and that is, taking what I may call popular Votes, and then applying them to services which have not been voted."

And Sir George Lewis (2293) said—

"Occasionally, as one Vote is a little more popular than another, and the House is more likely to agree to some particular Vote than to another, they might make the Estimate a little fuller upon that head, and they might starve it a little upon the unpopular Vote, in the speculation that they would save upon the popular Vote, and turn it over to the unpopular Vote."

While Mr. Gladstone (1577) gave this remarkable evidence—

"The Admiralty, as all those Departments, have a great temptation . . . to allow those surpluses to grow upon certain Votes, in order to form a fund for meeting the deficiencies upon other Votes. . . . It leads them . . . to provide surpluses in the main upon the more popular Votes, and to trust to them for supplying the deficiencies upon the more unpopular Votes."

Indeed, it was quite obvious that the practices of thus taking more than was required under one head, while another Vote was starved, was in itself very reprehensible; yet the evidence of all the leading witnesses who appeared before the Committee went to establish the truth of what he stated. To prove this important matter, still more clearly, he would show it by examples taken from the Estimates and accounts; he would give instances of Governments taking too much on Votes which were popular with the House, and starving those that were unpopular.

Vote 1, for Wages of Seamen, was a popular Vote. On such a Vote, surpluses were made by asking more than was required. Now, it appeared from the evidence, that since 1848, with one exception, there had always been large surpluses on this Vote; equal to £2,000,000 in thirty years, of which £1,700,000 had occurred in the last ten years alone, while in the year 1860-1 the surplus had amounted to £441,411. Vote 3, for the Admiralty Office, was an unpopular Vote. Such a Vote was starved, to delude the House of Commons; that is to say, less was provided than the Government intended to spend. It appeared in the evidence, that since 1832, with one exception, the Admiralty had always exceeded their Vote; they had exceeded it at an average of £5,000 per annum. And Mr. Arbutnot stated, that "there is no reason why the Admiralty should not estimate correctly, except the desire to starve an unpopular Vote." And the Duke of Somerset (1229) allowed this to be the true state of the case. Vote 4, for the Naval Reserve, was a popular Vote; that was, more was asked than would be wanted. The surplus on this Vote in 1859-60 was £96,000, and in 1860-1 it was £92,652. Vote 10, for Naval Stores, was an unpopular Vote, and less was asked for it than would be spent. It was proved, that during the last ten years, this Vote had been exceeded by £2,500,000; of which the excesses during the last two years alone had amounted to £1,000,000. Of this, none was attributable to the China war. For the last five years there had been an excess of £100,000 per annum for timber alone; and the excess during the last three years had been at the rate of £500,000 per annum for timber alone, although they were now building only iron ships. Now, Mr. Anderson said, that as all contracts were made at home, this expenditure could easily be correctly estimated. Hence this was a wilful starving of an unpopular Vote, designedly to be met out of other Votes. Vote 11, for Works, was of a mixed character, in part popular, and partly unpopular. With regard to this Vote, it was shown that £77,000 had been, in 1860-1, spent differently from the intentions of Parliament, and £10,000 more had been spent which had never been estimated for. Again, £15,000 had been granted for dredging Portsmouth; but £25,000 had been spent; and £12,000 had been spent for new docks, which had never been granted at all. Similarly, £10,500 had been spent for works at Hong-Kong, which had not been voted by Parliament, nor authorized by the Admiralty, nor sanctioned by the Treasury, nor estimated by any Department, nor even explained by the accounts. On the whole, it appeared in the evidence that, from 1856 to 1861, £5,000,000 had been spent on objects other than sanctioned by Parliament; and that Colonel Greene, the Director of Works, exclaimed, "The whole of the Estimates (for Works) are a series of those sorts of cases of excesses and surpluses." He had, he thought, said enough to justify him in maintaining that the 29th clause was injurious, and that its operation had justified the use of the epithet which he had the other evening applied to it, when he observed that it had "infatuated" or "whole financial system." He wished he could make this stigma hang round the neck of the 29th clause, as long as it appeared in the Appropriation Acts. Before passing to the next proposition he would therefore mention some more important evidence on this point. In the second Report, page vi, the Committee stated, that "the witnesses, with scarcely an exception, disapprove of the power as at present existing." The Duke of Somerset (1448) said, that "the Treasury check has totally failed;" and (1489) "everything that has happened since 1846 shows that the course taken has not resulted in what was intended." Mr. Macaulay (2150-3-4) "entirely agreed that the 29th clause should be repealed;" and said (2224, &c.) "the repeal of the 29th clause would effect every object." While Mr. Gladstone (1580), in quoting Mr. Anderson, said—

Lord Robert Montagu

"Let the 29th clause of the Appropriation Act, first introduced into the Act in 1846, and which unsettles the appropriation of all the grants of the year for the naval and military services, be expunged from the Appropriation Act, which will then be restored to its former state."

He should next pass to the third proposition which he sought to establish; which was, that no possible inconvenience would arise if Clause 29 were expunged. If some alternative (such as the plan of another Treasury Chest Fund) were thought necessary, let it be proposed by an additional Resolution. He did not himself think it necessary in a financial point of view; although in another point of view it might be most beneficial. For the different Departments were at daggers drawn with the Treasury, and tried to slip from under Treasury control. This scheme had therefore been devised in order to tie them down, and force them under the restraint of the Treasury. This, the House would remember, had been the object sought in framing the 29th clause, but which that clause had failed to attain.

To apply to the Treasury for an allowance out of a particular fund, in order to meet deficiencies, was far preferable to the mode of transfer under clause 29. For, when the accounts were made square by means of transfers, there was nothing to attract the notice of Parliament; there was no definite issue placed before the House. While, to apply for the use of a fund, and to give the reasons in writing for that application, and then to come to Parliament for a credit in order to repay that fund, brought a distinct question for discussion before the House. It was, nevertheless unnecessary to resort to this alternative; for, as matters stood, the accounts of the navy were got in eight months after the close of the financial year; then it was discovered that there were deficiencies on some of the Votes, caused partly by imprests at home, and partly by repayments to the Treasury chests abroad. It then became necessary to square the accounts for Parliament. According to the present system that was done by means of transfers. Now, a transfer did not mean a carrying about of money-bags; it was a mere matter of account, a credit transposed; it made no noise; it was done by a clerk taking the pen from behind his ear and writing a few figures. But, if the 29th clause were expunged, if the power of transfer were abolished, then all the balances (or surpluses) would have to be surrendered, and new credits would have to be voted, to meet the deficiencies and square the accounts. To surrender a balance, it must be remembered, meant merely to surrender a credit, to give up an authority to draw. How, then, it might be asked, could the current expenditure be carried on? The accounts at the pay office were mere current accounts, or cash accounts. Now before the navy accounts were squared they would have procured a new credit at the Bank. The expenditure could therefore be met out of these new credits; all payments could be made out of the navy cash. The only difference would be, that the accounts could not be squared without coming to Parliament for "Votes in excess;" that was, for new credits to clear off those deficiencies. To remove any doubt upon this point, he would refer to the evidence:—Colonel Greene (414) was asked "if he sees any objection in taking away that power of transferring surpluses?" and answered, "No, certainly not." Mr. Vine, the Inspector of the Audit Office, said (473). "I am not aware of any inconvenience to the public service that would arise from it." Mr. Arbuthnot (1117-1120) said, "The transfer is merely effected in the Admiralty books, and is a simple matter of account." The Duke of Somerset argued (1320) that the public payments would not be stopped even if every Vote were exceeded; so that, consequently, if the power of transfer were taken away, there would also be no inconvenience resulting. Mr. Whiffin, Deputy Accountant General, said (1979), "they can meet the expenditure out of the current army cash;" while Mr. Macaulay (2151) said, that "paying the surpluses into the Exchequer will not in the least degree embarrass the different Departments for money." He would compare the services in order to make this evident—namely, the army, the navy, and the civil services. In the case of the Civil Service, each Vote had its own special account in the books of the paymaster; each Vote had its own credit, and its balance was struck every week. When an issue was applied for, it was always specified for which Votes the issue was demanded. The consequence was, that a Civil Service Vote could never be exceeded, the balances at the end of the year were surrendered, and there were no transfers. In the case of the army or navy, money was issued on the aggregate credit; the paymaster knew not for what particular Votes it was issued, nor how the money was appropriated. Yet many of the Votes were for charges at home, and the payments were final payments, as in the Civil Service. The paymaster, in short, was, in the case of the Civil Service, a banker for each separate Vote; while in the case of the army and navy, he was a banker for the whole service; he must honour their draughts as long as they had a credit at his bank (so to speak) sufficient to meet their demands. His accounts were a mere banker's account—a current account—not an appropriation account. But when the navy made up their appropriation accounts, then deficiencies were discovered on some Votes, and surpluses on others. It then became a question how the accounts were to be squared. If it were by transfers, then no definite issue was brought before Parliament; but if the transfer clause were done away with, then the Departments could not square their accounts without coming to Parliament for credits to the amount by which they had exceeded, in their expenditure under particular heads ; and there was voluminous evidence to show that no inconvenience could result from such a mode of proceeding. He thanked the House for their indulgence in hearing him on so dry a subject, and hoped that they would bear in mind the propositions which he had proved. 1. That the 29th clause had failed in attaining the proposed object. 2. That it was most injurious to the public service, by increasing the expenditure ; by preventing the Departments coming before Parliament ; by promoting laxity in estimating ; by defeating the knowledge of Parliament ; and by causing the Government to take too much on the popular Votes, and starve the unpopular. 3. That, in the nature of things, no inconvenience could result from expunging the obnoxious clause altogether. The noble Lord concluded by moving—

"1. That every Bill hereafter introduced for the appropriation of supplies be printed and distributed in time for consideration before it passes through Committee of the House.

"2. That it is inexpedient that any Bill for the appropriation of supplies shall contain the power of transfer which was first introduced into the Appropriation Act of 1846, and which unsettles the appropriation of all the grants of the year for the naval and military services."

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That every Bill hereafter introduced for the appropriation of Supplies be printed and distributed in time for consideration before it passes through Committee of the House."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could not concur in several important points with the opinions expressed by the noble Lord. He thought the noble Lord had very much exaggerated the effect produced in the augmentation of expenditure by arrangements—certainly in themselves defective—with regard to the fiscal laws of transfer. No doubt the tendency of lax and defective arrangements was to increased expenditure ; but he could not agree, as the noble Lord seemed to assume, that the aggregate amount of expenditure had been very largely increased. He differed, too, from the noble Lord on another point, which though not expressly asserted by him, was assumed and taken for granted all through his speech. He gathered from the noble Lord's speech that he was of opinion that in all cases where the Vote on a particular item was exceeded by the expenditure, whether that deficiency was capable or not of being supplied from the aggregate fund voted for the service of the year, it ought to be made the subject of a supplementary Estimate. [Lord ROBERT MONTAGU : Of a Vote of excess.] That, of course, was a very different matter ; but still it was a popular and plausible delusion, that if, on any emergency arising, there was an excess of expenditure on the sum actually voted for a particular service, it ought at once to be brought before Parliament in the shape of a supplementary Estimate. From his experience in the office he had the honour to hold, he was persuaded that there was no practice which would be more destructive of Parliamentary control over the expenditure. It had been a matter of regret to him that on several occasions, from very grave and sufficient reasons, supplementary Estimates had been presented during his term of office, but he was firmly convinced that the whole effectiveness of Parliamentary control depended upon the state of the finances—the balance of income and expenditure—being once a year gathered together and submitted as a whole to Parliament—and in a plan being submitted to Parliament which should substantially, and in the main, govern the whole expenditure and income of the year. But, if from any idea of the supreme control of Parliament, the Government were to be called on every week or every fortnight to bring down supplementary Estimates, the control of Parliament over the expenditure of the year would be entirely nullified under the semblance of consulting its dignity. It was impossible for Parliament to give its whole attention to these points, and he held it to be a canon of all sound finance that supplementary Estimates should be few and as limited in extent as possible. Coming next to matters of fact, he was afraid that the noble Lord had not taken into view what had been recommended by the Committee on Public Accounts, and what had actually been done by the Government. To adopt the noble Lord's second Resolution, which was the most important, would be like taking precautions against dangers which had ceased to exist. When the question was examined before the Committee of the previous year, all that the noble Lord had stated to the House was taken fully into consideration. It was felt that the system was defective. The Act of 1846 sanctioned practices which had previously prevailed without any sanction at all ; and though the provisions of that Act might be defective, the noble Lord would find that, substantially, the whole of what he had proposed had been adopted under that Act. The power of transfer, in fact, which he described and denounced, no longer existed. A plan had been submitted in the previous year by which certain separate funds would have been established, out of which these excesses might have been temporarily supplied. That plan was not adopted by the Committee, but in lieu of it another plan was adopted. New securities were taken to insure the submission of these excesses to the Treasury, so that the Treasury had greater certainty than it ever possessed before that these excesses would be submitted to it. The matter being thus brought under the notice of the Treasury, it was likewise provided, that although the Treasury, out of unappropriated surpluses, was authorized to advance sums to meet the deficiencies on particular Votes, yet that such appropriations should be of a purely provisional character, that they should only hold good until the final closing of the account, and that after that closing of the account the expenditure in excess should be definitively met by a Vote in excess. That Vote would not correspond precisely in its technical character with Votes in excess as we now understood them. They referred to excesses properly so called, which entered into the Exchequer account of the year in which they were passed, and materially disturbed the relative balance of expenditure and income. The essence of the noble Lord's Motion, as he understood it, was to bring each transaction on its merits to the judgment of Parliament; so that by the arrangements of the different Departments they might not be prevented coming under the attention of House. That was precisely the object of the clause which had been incorporated into the Appropriation Act. The 26th clause of that Act provided, that where there was an excess of expenditure, on application being made to the Treasury, the Treasury might thereupon be authorized, temporarily, to defray the excess out of any surplus which might have accrued; and it was then provided, that within a given time after the assembling of Parliament, the proceedings should be laid before it for its sanction, and provision be made to meet the several excesses on the several Votes in such manner as Parliament might determine. The criticism, therefore, of the noble Lord was directed to a state of things which no longer existed, and he was endeavouring to provide a remedy for that which had already been cured by Parliamentary proceedings. Unfortunately, it was impossible, in the varied expenses of a great country like this, for every Department to know exactly the precise amount of its expenditure, and it was necessary that some slight margin should be left. It would be most undesirable to say to each Department, "You must take into account, in framing each particular Vote the extremest amount which you can possibly require, and call on the Chancellor of the Exchequer to provide for it out of the income of the year on a scale which will cover all emergencies." With regard to the noble Lord's first Resolution, of course it was very proper that the Appropriation Bill should be accessible to Members, but he scarcely thought it desirable to go to the expense of from £50 to £100 for printing 658 Bills, of which, perhaps, not a dozen would be used. The principle of the noble Lord's first Resolution was sound; and if he would take it in the following terms, he should have no objection to its being adopted:—

Lord Robert Montagu

"That a sufficient number of Copies of every Bill hereafter introduced for the appropriation of Supplies be printed and delivered to Members applying for them in time for consideration before it passes through Committee of the Whole House."

With regard to the second Resolution, he had endeavoured to point out that the object at which it aimed had already been obtained.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, he was Chairman of the Committee on Public Accounts which sat during the last year, and the House ought to be made acquainted with what had taken place. No doubt changes in the Appropriation Acts had been made without the knowledge of the House, and it was proper that hon. Members who paid attention to these subjects should have the opportunity of seeing the Bill in print before it was passed. There had been great looseness in the matter, and it was necessary to put a stop to that looseness. The Committee over which he presided considered several plans, and at length came to a decision to make recommendations, which the Government had adopted, and which he believed carried into effect all that could be reasonably wished. In future the sanction of the House was to be obtained for the appropriation of any excess in any one Vote to another Vote, in whatever Department the excess arose. He could not see the use of passing a Resolution to do that which had been done already, and he warned the House against interfering with the transfer clause. Under the old practice the Admiralty of itself transferred the excess of one Vote to another Vote, but a change was made by which the sanction of the Treasury was required. If they repealed the transfer clause, the Admiralty would get rid of the check of the Treasury. What the noble Lord wished was to increase the check, and the Committee recommended them to strengthen it by adding the necessity for the sanction of the House. Under these circumstances, he hoped the House would not come to a Resolution which would entirely upset the plan of the Committee, and would abolish a valuable means of keeping the different Departments in order.

MR. SPEAKER asked whether the noble Lord accepted the Amendment of the Chancellor of the Exchequer?

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that he did.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sufficient number of Copies of every Bill hereafter introduced for the appropriation of Supplies be printed and delivered to Members applying for them in time for consideration before it passes through Committee of the Whole House."

MR. HADFIELD said, he was friendly to the publication of all the Acts of the House, and therefore he should support the principle of the first Resolution. But it did not go far enough. He wished the Indemnity Bill as well as the Appropriation Bill to be printed. The Indemnity Bill ought not only to be printed in the folio edition of the statutes, but that as the greatest part of the expense of setting the types must be incurred, copies should be supplied to any Members who required them. It was a reflection on the House to be passing a Bill every year indemnifying persons from penalties for not taking an oath against the Pretender.

MR. SPEAKER said, he must call the hon. Member to order, as he was not addressing himself to the question before the House.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would move as an Amendment that the Indemnity Bill be included in the first Resolution, and then he should be in order in referring to that Bill. He protested against the House being made ridiculous by passing Bills which excused even those who passed them—including the Law Officers of the Crown—from the penalties incurred by a neglect to make unnecessary and ridiculous declarations, the ground of such excuse being that they did not know the law.

Amendment proposed, after the word "Supplies," to insert the words "and every annual Indemnity Bill."

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, that the chief argument which had been brought against him was that a change had been made last year in the transfer clause, which clause the Chancellor of the Exchequer had denominated "an evil," and which this change had "cured." The change which had been referred to might be an improvement, but they had no experience how it would work, and no security even for its continuance. At any time they might return to the old system without the cognizance of the House. But as it was agreed on all sides that the clause had failed in its object, and was an evil, he must express his astonishment at the desire which was evinced to bolster up a bad cause. He would, however, consent to withdraw his second Resolution. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had assumed that he (Lord Robert Montagu) wished him to come down to the House "every fortnight" to adjust the accounts. He meant that this should be done once for all, when the accounts were closed. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had objected also that "a Vote in excess entered into the account of the year in which it is voted." This was true of a cash account, but it would not be thus in the case of service accounts, such as those of the army and navy. He should withdraw the second Resolution.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to remind the House of the offer of the Secretary of State for War to furnish the detailed accounts of the army expenditure, if they were moved for. He wished also to appeal to those hon. Members of the Committee who had said that there was no objection to their being presented, to say whether further examination confirmed them in that conclusion, because if they were to check the power of transfer, which had been abused, they must have before them the detailed accounts of the expenditure of the army for the past year when they were dealing with the Estimates.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Sir Francis Baring

Ordered,

That a sufficient number of Copies of every Bill hereafter introduced for the appropriation of Supplies, and every annual Indemnity Bill, be printed and delivered to Members applying for them in time for consideration before it passes through Committee of the Whole House.

PROCESSION AND ILLUMINATION
ACCIDENTS (METROPOLIS).

RETURNS MOVED FOR.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he rose to move an address for Returns of the names of the persons killed or injured during the procession of the 7th of March and on the occasion of the recent illuminations in the City on the 10th of March, and of persons who afterwards died in consequence of injuries received on either of those days; and of the persons injured on either of those days whose cases were reported to the City and metropolitan police, distinguishing the localities in which the deaths and injuries occurred. The difficulties which arose in the City, upon the occasion of the procession of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and the Princess Alexandra, were unhappily matters of public notoriety. Under the circumstances the fatal accidents to which his Motion referred, ought not to have occurred; for if ever proper notice was given to authorities, it was given on that occasion. For several days, previously to the 7th instant, the City had been engaged in making the most extensive preparations for the Royal reception, which attracted such crowds of spectators that the streets were almost impassable, so that there was ample warning of what was to be expected on the day of the arrival of the Princess. Besides, notice was given from a quarter which ought to have received deferential attention. They had the statement of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, that he had tendered the Lord Mayor the assistance of the military, which was in the first instance declined; but when the Commander-in-Chief, fortified by the opinion of a council of officers, again pressed the use of the military on the Lord Mayor, his Lordship accepted the aid of a limited number of mounted artillery. If he had not done so, the most fearful consequences would probably have ensued. But as it was, the City authorities could not be held to be free from blame. They arranged the programme and published an order for the clearing of certain streets at stated times; but long after the fixed hour the streets were encumbered with vehicles of every description in defiance of their own regulations. There was an appalling scene at London Bridge, which was crowded long after the hour that had been fixed for clearing it, and there was great anxiety as to the possibility of making a passage over the bridge for the Royal procession. So densely were the people massed in front of the Fishmongers' Hall that it was wonderful some were not crushed to death, and it was a grave question where the people on the bridge were to be forced to. A few policemen, who had been placed on the bridge to perform an impossible task, made an attempt to clear the bridge, but failed hopelessly; and when the duty was undertaken by the mounted artillery, the result was to drive an immense mass of human beings on to the already overcrowded spaces opposite Fishmongers' Hall, along King William Street, and before the Mansion House. The City procession then began to make its appearance, getting through the crowd as it best could; but only part of it crossed the bridge; and when the Royal carriages reached the centre of the bridge, they could get no farther for some time, because the corporation carriages, advancing to meet the Royal carriages, stopped the way. All that showed great want of precaution on the part of the City authorities, and at the same time evidenced in a remarkable degree the good conduct of the people, and they could only be thankful that the number of fatalities was not larger. Had there been evil-disposed persons in the crowd, or had the police displayed anger or irritation, much more serious consequences might have been apprehended. Several lives, however, had been sacrificed and limbs broken, and it was well worth inquiry how these grave accidents had occurred. In King William Street, on the Saturday, a woman had been thrown down from a stand which had been improperly erected there; her arm was broken, and she was removed to an hospital, where she subsequently died; and it was on account of that case he had introduced the 7th of March as well as the 10th into his Motion. The public mind had been painfully excited on the subject, and he thought it most desirable that all the facts that could be ascertained should be laid before the House previous to the discussion on the Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir De Lacy Evans) for the amalgamation of the metropolitan and

City police; so that the House might have correct data upon which to form an opinion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Returns of the Names of the Persons killed or injured during the Procession on the 7th day of March 1863, and on the occasion of the Illuminations in the City on the 10th day of March 1863, and of Persons who afterwards died in consequence of injuries received on either of those days:

"And, of the Persons injured on either of those days, whose cases were reported to the City and Metropolitan Police, distinguishing the Localities in which the deaths and injuries occurred."

MR. NORRIS said, he rose to move that the Return be supplemented by a Return of the number of persons killed and wounded on the occasion of the lying in state and funeral of the Duke of Wellington; and a copy of any order issued by the metropolitan police authorities with a view to prevent such accidents. He moved that addition because he thought that the information furnished, to be of any value, should be as full as possible, and he hoped that the House would suspend their judgment until they obtained full information. As the hon. Member, however, had given a detailed account of what took place in the City, he might, perhaps, be permitted to say that the great blunder which had been committed was that of confining the full procession to so limited a line of road as that which existed between London Bridge and Temple Bar. Another fact which he would mention was this— that on the morning of the 7th March he attempted to approach the Mansion House from the north of London; but when he got as far as the junction of Newgate Street, and St. Martin's le-Grand, his carriage, those of other people, and a great many respectable persons on foot, were prevented getting into Cheapside by van-load after van-load of metropolitan policemen being driven from the West End through the City of London; and an obstruction of that kind having occurred, it was certainly right to inquire how far the metropolitan and the City police authorities acted in harmony upon such occasions. When one body of police was found fault with, and another was found adding to the obstruction, the House ought to suspend its judgment until the whole of the facts were before them. If it could be proved that the City authorities had neglected their duty, they ought to be called upon to resign the authority which they possessed.

Mr. Harvey Lewis

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words "also a Return of the number of Persons killed and wounded on the occasions of the Lying in State and Funeral of the late Duke of Wellington:

"And, Copy of any Order issued by the Metropolitan Police authorities, with a view to prevent a recurrence of such accidents."

THE LORD MAYOR (Mr. Alderman ROSE) said, he thought it would be inconvenient upon that occasion to attempt to answer the observations of the hon. Member for Marylebone; but when the Returns had been furnished, the whole circumstances would be in possession of the public, and they would then be able to judge of the merits of the question. He might, however, be allowed to repeat what he had stated before, that troops having been offered to him, he accepted that offer on the very day on which it was made. There was, however, some little irregularity on the part of Sir Richard Mayne in communicating the offer. Such offer was made in an unofficial manner; but the moment the offer was officially made, he at once accepted it verbally, and within two hours a written acceptance of the offer was sent to His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, and that letter also thanked him for the offer so made. Further, when two officers were sent down to him (the Lord Mayor) he not only expressed his gratitude for the 200 troops who were offered, but said that if 100 or 200 more could be sent he should be thankful.

COLONEL NORTH said, he wished to know whether, when his gallant Friend Sir Richard Airey first made an offer of troops to the Lord Mayor, on behalf of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, he did not meet with a refusal.

THE LORD MAYOR (Mr. Alderman ROSE) said, that he most distinctly stated that personally he was very much obliged to His Royal Highness for his kind consideration, but that he being the occupant of his office for one year only could not accept the offer off-hand; that personally he accepted it, but that a written communication would be sent as soon as the proper parties could be consulted, and that written communication was sent, he believed, about an hour after the interview by special messenger.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he thought that was not the time to discuss the arrangements of the City Police. It was quite obvious, however, that that force was quite insufficient to meet the recent emergency. He had not seen the report referred to by the Lord Mayor, but had no doubt he would find it at the office on the following day. He had no objection either to the Motion or the supplement to it.

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Returns of the Names of the Persons killed or injured during the Procession on the 7th day of March 1863, and on the occasion of the Illuminations in the City on the 10th day of March 1863, and of Persons who afterwards died in consequence of injuries received on either of those days:

Of the Persons injured on either of those days, whose cases were reported to the City and Metropolitan Police, distinguishing the Localities in which the deaths and injuries occurred:

Of the number of Persons killed and wounded on the occasions of the Lying in State and Funeral of the late Duke of Wellington:

And, Copy of any Order issued by the Metropolitan Police authorities, with a view to prevent a recurrence of such accidents.

PARTNERSHIP LAW AMENDMENT

BILL—[Bill 26.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD, in rising to move the second reading, said, the Bill contained a considerable number of provisions, but the main one was intended to extend the principle of limited liability to private partnerships, and to enable clerks to share in the profits of a concern without incurring the liabilities of partners, or acquiring the rights of partners. There were also clauses introducing the principle of arbitration into partnerships, where arbitration clauses did not already exist; and, finally, there were provisions for registering the names of parties not already mentioned in the titles of the firms to which they belonged. The Bill contained so many different provisions that it had provoked hostility in various quarters; but he might say at once that he regarded as its leading principle that which related to the limited liability of partners. No one would deny that contracts, whether of partnerships or anything else, should be as free and unrestricted as possible, excepting where they were immoral in themselves or adverse to public policy, or where they were so susceptible of fraud that it would be better to refuse than to admit them. Nor was he then called upon to defend the principle of limited liability, for it had already been sanctioned by Parliament, and was, in fact, part of the law of the land. He merely had to advocate the application of the principle to private partnerships. At present, if a capitalist wished to assist a relative, a deserving clerk, or an inventor, there were only two modes by which he could do it. One was, by lending money at a fixed rate of interest; and the other was, by becoming a partner of the person whom he desired to befriend. If he lent money at a fixed rate of interest, he might not be tempted by the amount which he would receive; or if he obtained a satisfactory amount, it might be far too heavy for the business to bear, especially if the business were one of fluctuating profits. On the other hand, by becoming a partner in the concern, he made himself liable to his last acre and his last shilling. Few men were disposed to run so great a risk, and the consequence was, that a great deal of capital which would otherwise be introduced into commercial enterprises, and so brought to the aid of men of intelligence and perseverance, now went into other speculations, many of them in foreign countries, which were thus enriched at the expense of our own. The present Bill was meant to obviate that difficulty. Its object was to enable any capitalist, if he felt so disposed, to advance a fixed sum of money to a private partnership, becoming a limited partner in the concern, liable only for the amount he had placed in it. That facility, however, was accompanied by stringent provisions of registration, and the registration would give the names of all the partners, limited as well as unlimited, showing the amount of money which each limited partner had put into the concern, and stating the conditions upon which, and the time for which, it was advanced. It would afford, in short, all the information which creditors had a right to ask. The name of the limited partner would not be mentioned in the title of the firm, and he would not be liable to bankruptcy; but of course it would be different with the general partners, who would be liable to their last farthing. He need hardly say that the subject of limited private partnerships was not a new one to Parliament. So long ago as 1782 an Act had been passed in Ireland, the object of which was precisely the same as that of the present Bill. In 1836 the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir Francis Baring) prepared the heads of a similar measure; and in the following year Mr. Bellenden Ker, in a Report drawn up at the request of the Board of Trade, admitted that the system was in most successful operation throughout the Continent. Two high authorities—Lord Overstone and the first Lord Ashburton—gave evidence on the subject before a Parliamentary Committee in 1844, the first objecting to any change of the law, and the second expressing himself as, upon the whole, favourable to limited liability, on the ground that it would bring out a great deal of capital now lying dormant or sent to other countries. In 1851 another Committee recommended that power should be given to lend money for periods of not less than twelve months, at rates of interest varying with the rates of profits, the lender not being liable beyond the sum advanced, and proper precautions being taken against fraud. The Mercantile Law Commission in 1853 was divided in opinion, the majority deciding against limited liability partnerships, but three of the Commissioners—Mr. Baron Bramwell, Mr. Anderson, and the hon. Member for Bridport—declared themselves in favour of limited liability, and signed a separate Report to that effect. In 1854 the House, upon the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier), affirmed a Resolution declaring that the law of partnership which rendered every person who, though not ostensibly a partner, shared in the profits, liable for the whole debts of the partnership, was unsatisfactory, and ought to be so modified as to permit persons contributing to the capital to share in the profits without incurring a liability beyond a certain limited amount. Such was the decision of the House in 1854, and the Bill which he then submitted to their consideration was really founded on that Resolution. The present state of the law on the subject did not rest upon any statute, but on a decision of Chief Justice Eyre in 1793, which was impugned by men of great eminence, among whom were Mr. Baron Bramwell, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), and Mr. Rickards, counsel to the Speaker. Mr. Stuart Mill, Mr. Senior, and other distinguished economists, also advocated this principle; the whole constituting a sufficient weight of authority to justify him in claiming a favourable consideration for his proposal. The system of limited liability was, moreover, in operation on the Continent of Europe as well as in the United States of America, and it was favoured by some of our most eminent legal societies, and supported by a great number of the chambers of commerce, though he was sorry to say not by all, one of the exceptions being that of the city of Glasgow, whose objections would be stated by the hon. Member for that city (Mr. Buchanan). If the House should be pleased to agree to his Motion, he would ask that the measure be referred to a Select Committee. He begged to move that the Bill be now read the second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”

MR. BUCHANAN: Sir, the Bill before the House should have been divided into two or more Bills, as it contemplates several distinct and separate objects. The most important of these is the extension of limited liability to all partnerships, and the other next in importance, is the registration of partnerships. It would have been desirable to have had an opportunity of discussing these subjects separately, as many who approve of registration of partnerships are opposed to the extension of limited liability. This appears evident from the Petitions which have been presented to the House. It might, therefore, be a desirable course to refer the clauses of the Bill, as to registration, to a Select Committee. It would then be found what are the practical difficulties to be overcome, whether it is possible to define a partnership with sufficient clearness, whether partnerships for special purposes and for short periods should be registered, and whether the trading of the poorer classes should be burdened with the cost and trouble attending registration. All these are matters of detail, and if there is no objection to the principle involved, might with advantage be left to the discussion of a Select Committee. But I object to adopting the same course in regard to the more important part of this Bill, which proposes to extend the principle of limited liability, by making it permissive in all partnerships.

Objecting strongly to that proposal, I have thought it only fair to those hon. Members who may agree with me, as well as to the numerous mercantile bodies who by petition or otherwise have expressed their hostility to the Bill, to move an Amendment, which will at least produce discussion, and test the opinion of the House. I am sure that the hon. Member for Birmingham, whose judicious and practical course in this House no man more appreciates than myself, will not regard what I have proposed to be discourteous, more particularly as it coincides with the advice and deliberate opinions of various commercial bodies whose sentiments are entitled to great consideration. I have had the honour of presenting a petition from the Chamber of Commerce of Glasgow, objecting to the extension of limited liability; the Chambers of Commerce of Halifax and Hull have followed the same course; and the Associated Chambers of Commerce at their recent annual meeting, held in London in February, have also condemned that principle.

Mr. Scholefield

I shall not notice the various steps which have been taken with a view to alter the law of partnership, by introducing limited liability previous to 1853; and I refer to the Report of the Royal Commission appointed in that year, principally because it contains the most valuable arguments and facts bearing on the subject, and may be regarded as a text book of the theory and practice of limited partnerships. The Commission consisted of eight Members, all of them men of high position, and legal or mercantile experience. After examining much evidence contained in written replies to queries circulated by the Commission among leading statesmen, lawyers, and merchants at home, and having also communicated with merchants in foreign countries, they came to the conclusion, by a majority of six to two, that it was inexpedient to change the law of partnership. But this decision did not abate the ardour of the supporters of limited liability. In 1855 a Bill was introduced on the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock, on behalf of the Government, and became law, enabling joint stock companies to be registered with limited liability. A further step in the same direction was made in 1858, when banking companies were enabled to avail themselves of the same privilege. In regard to that legislation, it is not my intention to say a single word, either in approval or condemnation. The wisdom of Parliament has sanctioned, and in the recent consolidated statute has deliberately re-enacted, the principle of limited liability in regard to joint-stock companies and banks. We are now asked to take a much more important and more perilous step. We are asked to permit this limitation of liability in all partnerships, by adopting the French form of commandite companies.

It is therefore high time to inquire what has been the success of our experiments hitherto. And first of all, have we had sufficient time to judge of these statutes, which have only been perfected by the consolidated Act of last Session, and exist on the statute book only eight and five years respectively? There has not, therefore, been a long experience of this new principle in our mercantile law such as to justify a farther advance in the same direction. But it may be said—Has there been any marked success at all? Has public opinion sanctioned the change of the law by any distinct and unanimous expression? If there really had been a general agreement in favour of limited companies, there would be sufficient proofs of it in the general adoption of the system. Three Returns in regard to limited companies, have been presented to the House, the first and last on the Motion of the hon. Member for Argyllshire, and the second on the Motion of the hon. Member for Lancaster. By the first of these Returns it appears that during three years, from the 17th July 1856 to the 29th July 1859 (omitting the first six months after the Act came into operation), 1,010 joint-stock companies were registered in England, or 336 annually; and during the same period 290 of these companies were abandoned, or nearly one-third of the whole. During the period embraced by the second Return, two years and a half, there were registered 901 companies, and 73 abandoned; to which must be added the abandonments in a supplemental list, coming down to 1862, and amounting to 214 additional, making 287 companies abandoned, of 901 registered, or considerably above a third. The last Return is for the year 1862, during which period 423 companies have been registered, and 61 abandoned, including a supplemental list of companies previously returned. Similar Returns applicable to Ireland and Scotland have been presented, and give nearly the same results. In seven years the whole number of companies registered in England has been 2,334, and of these 638 have been abandoned, or something approaching to one-third of the whole number. Any one who considers the enormous extent of English commerce will admit that these figures are significant, and indicate no great desire on the part of the public to enter into such companies. The great boon of limitation of liability seems so far to have been little appreciated. As regards banks, the Returns are even more suggestive. Since the passing of the Act, in 1858, only nine banks have been registered with limited liability, and of these one has been abandoned. None of the old-established banks have availed themselves of the privilege, so far as the Returns show; but it is understood that two banking companies, one at Manchester and one at Liverpool, have recently been reconstituted on that principle. During 1862 thirty-six banks have been registered, many of them quite recently, and as to all we have only a short experience. Again, it may be asked, where is there any proof of public anxiety for limited banking companies? Colonial banks incorporated by charter and with special conditions of liability (generally twice the amount of shares) are not included in these remarks. Of the 2,334 companies registered, 638 have ceased to exist, dissolved, wound up, and many of them bankrupt. It is to be regretted that the Returns before the House contain no records of the winding-up of these companies in the courts of law. It is believed that in many cases they would present examples of reckless mismanagement, and not unfrequently of swindling. In all of them it will be found that debt has been freely incurred, and that the dividends for distribution among creditors have been small. The hon. and learned Member for Guildford, whose great experience in the courts of law entitles his opinion to much weight, said, in the debate on the 13th May, 1858—

“In the cases [of limited liability companies] which had come into the courts, it had generally appeared that all the money which had been paid up was spent, and that there was nothing for the creditors.”

No doubt, subsequent experience has been of the same kind, though, so far as I know, not attested by the same high authority. If current rumours are to be trusted, the disclosures made in the winding-up of these companies continue to be disgraceful.

All these facts afford no encouragement to extend this system. The advocates of this Bill are bound not only to show that so far there has been success in the working of their principle, but that such success has been marked and decisive. The burden of proof rests with them; they must establish a success which warrants a farther advance in the same direction, and we ask for facts to justify that course. But it is said, limited liability and commandite companies have worked well in other countries. I confess that I have been unable to find any conclusive proof of that great success; at least, it is not to be found in the evidence laid before the Commission of 1853. France has been mainly relied on, and the forms of the French law have been imported into this Bill. But, let any one go over the evidence, and he will find that instead of a history of great success, we have only apologies for non-success from the principal French witnesses. They have told us, not that the commandite principle has succeeded, but that it has been abused. Even the hon. Member for Bridport, who was one of the Commissioners and reported favourably of the French law, does not deny that it has been abused, and that the practice of mixing up the two different principles of sociétés anonymes and en commandite ought to be abolished. I cannot do better than refer to the summary of this part of the argument in the Report of Mr. Slater, one of the Commissioners, which will be found at page 44 of the Report. To the same effect Mr. M'Culloch has written in the late edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica (article “Partnership”).

It is alleged that in America the success has been great, but the testimony to that effect is not unanimous. Sir William Brown, well known and respected in this House, Messrs. Haven and Curtis, of Boston, Messrs. Biddle of Philadelphia, and Binnie, an eminent American jurist, all agree as to the frequent abuses resulting from sociétés en commandite. To the same effect is the testimony of Mr. M'Culloch, in the article already alluded to. From Holland and Belgium also we have conflicting testimony as to these societies. In all cases there is an admission of abuses, and numerous proposals for remedy. Again, it may be asked, are these evidences of success sufficient to warrant us in following these foreign examples? Do not tell us that the principle is a good one, but has been ill-worked. You ask us to adopt a new law, and on you lies the proof that it has elsewhere succeeded. Your argument requires that you should have not partial, but great, and even brilliant success. I confess, I do not know where such proof is to be found. From anything that appears in evidence, at home and abroad, we are not warranted in making further changes in our law. It is merely to carry out a theory that we are asked to adopt the Bill. The Legislature has sanctioned the principle of limited liability in recent statutes; and in order that there may be uniformity in our laws, all partnerships are to be brought under the same category. But that is not a practical argument. In many cases it may be right to go a certain length, and quite wrong to go further. It remains for those who demand a further change in the law, to prove that they are recommending a safe course. But further it has been said, why should parties be restrained from forming any contracts which they may deem for their interest? If the conditions are avowed, and contemplate a legal object, there should be no impediment to such contracts. Interference and restraint are contrary to the principles of freedom recognized in recent legislation. No one has put this argument with more clearness and power than the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Board of Education, who says, at page 84 of the Report—

Mr. Buchanan

"The only case in which the State is justified in prohibiting parties from contracting, is where a contract arises out of a breach of law or morality, as gambling, or is made for the purpose of a future breach of law and morality, as smuggling, or is in itself a breach of some other substantive law, as insuring an enemy's ship. I can find nothing against morality, nothing against public policy, in the legal sense of the word, in contracts of limited liability; and as to whether such contracts are advantageous to those who enter into them, afford facilities for fraud, tend to impair the credit of the concern, or encourage unhealthy speculation, I think we may fairly leave individuals to judge, without State interference."

This argument is carried too far when it assumes that the State, as guardian of the public interest, is under no obligation, in so far as just and equal laws can accomplish it, to prevent fraud. It is much the same as if it were maintained that the State is not bound to prevent larceny. The great principle salus populi, summa lex, requires that the freedom of the subject shall be restrained in various respects. All law is a system of restraint. A man may not scatter firebrands, nor randish deadly weapons, nor sell poisons; neither ought he to be allowed to make contracts manifestly affording facilities to fraud. In the opinion of the most competent authorities, the farther extension of limited liability would produce wholesale swindling. If so, the State is not only bound to afford no facilities, but to resist to the utmost whatever may lead to such consequences. Of course, the weight of this argument will depend on the proof that limited liability tends to encourage contracts of a collusive and fraudulent kind, and that will be attempted to be shown. In the mean time, I may say that the great objection to such companies, their inherent and ineradicable defect, is that they open a wide door to fraud. Even the hon. Member for Bridport, in his able and valuable paper in the Appendix to the Report of the Royal Commissioners, has guarded his statement of the general principle that there should be perfect freedom in contracts, by the notable reservation, "guarding against wilful deception." If wilful deception could be guarded against, this Bill would stand in a better position, but the proviso of the hon. Member cannot be made effectual, and his whole argument is consequently undermined.

As has been already said, the Bill before the House has adopted the principle of the French law of commandite. The third clause shows what is the nature of the proposal. Any company consisting of two or more persons, may be registered as a limited company. Two persons, of whom one shall be the general partner—the gérant of the French law—and the other the special partner, or commanditaire, upon complying with certain conditions of publicity, as narrated in Clause 4, may demand of the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, to be registered as a limited company. It may seem an extreme case, but it is not improbable, that two persons might form such a partnership; the one possessed of capital, the other of skill. If the capitalist should pay up the capital to be registered (though for the actual payment there is no security), it would be known to the world; but as to the general partner, there is no certainty that he shall have paid up or be possessed of anything at all. These parties might proceed to trade, to contract debts, to divide profits, whether earned or not, and finally become insolvent, leaving nothing for their creditors, though their debts may have exceeded the amount of their registered capital twenty times over, and the nominal profits which have been drawn out be more than the original stock of the company. It must be manifest that such a law would afford the temptation and the opportunity to fraudulent and collusive contracts among partners—to a system of false valuations and dishonest accounting, rendered easy, as every practical merchant knows, by the difficulty of appreciating mercantile assets, scattered over the world. The first marked distinction between the existing law of limited joint-stock companies and the commandite companies to be formed under the present Bill, consists in the different objects which they respectively contemplate. Hitherto, limited joint-stock companies have been usually registered for purposes of public advantage, as the supply of water, gas, public parks, canals, or undertakings of risk and magnitude, beyond the reach of private enterprise. If the Returns on the table are consulted, it will be found that such has generally been the character and objects of these companies. The present Bill holds out no such pretence; private gain is the only object. Whatever indulgence or relaxation of the law it may have been considered expedient to make in the public interest, no similar favour should be shown to private speculations.

Farther, seven partners are required by the law to be associated in a limited joint-stock company. Two partners, one of whom may be a man of straw, may constitute a partnership under this Bill. The difference is important, for seven men cannot combine to defraud their creditors with the same facility as two. The joint-stock companies were required to make their proceedings public. The amounts of capital subscribed, and the amounts paid, were specified and registered. There was a periodical audit provided to be made by neutral auditors, and skilled accountants scrutinized the balance-sheet before profits could be declared. All these precautions in the public interest are to be abandoned. There is to be no published statement of the whole capital account, much less of the items of which it is composed, whether of cash or goods. There is to be no means of knowing whether the limited capital, which is registered, has been actually paid up. There is no provision for a scrutiny of accounts before profits are declared; even an ordinary balance by the partners is not enjoined. For anything that appears to the contrary in the clauses of the Bill, alleged profits may be divided without being earned. If subsequent losses occur, there is no provision for making up the capital to the amount registered by the special partners, so that the register itself may become a snare, instead of a guide to the creditors of the company. On all these points, I cannot do better than quote from the Report of the Commissioners; and I shall briefly refer to the opinions of Lord Overstone, than whom there can be no higher authority; of that acute and learned Judge Lord Curriehill, one of the Commissioners, besides several Members of this House, whose opinions I quote, both as having an opportunity to correct me, if I shall mis-state them, and as being generally opposed to my views. Lord Overstone's opinions will be found at page 96 of the Report. The quotation from Lord Curriehill's Report is at page 17; the hon. Member for Calne, page 84; the hon. Member for Manchester, page 100; and the hon. Member for Peterborough, at page 102. With these high authorities, we are entitled to say that any Bill should be rejected by this House which neither requires the publication of the whole capital of a company nor provides machinery for audit of accounts or the replacement of lost capital. One point may be noticed, though in itself of little consequence. The French law prevents the special partner from interfering in the management of the commandite company. The provision is of little value, in so far as it is impossible to prevent the co-partners from holding unofficial consultations which might equally control the gérant as direct interference. But the principle of the French law is good, in so far as it is meant to prevent a partner with a limited risk from sporting with the funds of the company. But even this safeguard, imperfect as it is, has been omitted in this Bill. Nay, what is still worse, the special partner is not prohibited from signing the firm of the company. For anything that appears to the contrary, he may commit his co-partners by word or writing to any extent, while he himself incurs a limited risk only. The only safeguard proposed by the Bill against acts of management by the special partner is that his name shall not appear in the firm. Farther, the trading of individuals for their own account, frequently the most prudent and efficient trading, is placed at an unfair disadvantage by being exposed to the reckless competition of limited companies. But it will no doubt occur to many, why should this be so? If two partners, one of whom may be a man of straw, may trade limited, why may not an individual also announce that he has registered a limited amount of his capital, which alone will be available for his trade debts. True, this is an argumentum ad absurdum, but consistency requires that the advocates of this Bill should draw a clear line of distinction, by showing wherefore one man should be debarred from a privilege which is claimed for two men, though in both cases there may be but one capital.

Mr. Buchanan

Before quitting the specific proposals of this Bill, it may be noticed, that its framers have disregarded the recommendations of the Law Amendment Society. That society has recommended that the capital, no doubt the whole capital, should be paid up, though how that is to be ascertained is not very obvious. No portion of the capital may be withdrawn, though profits may be paid out, and the special partner may not sign the firm, make contracts, or engage or dismiss servants. None of these securities against abuse are to be found in this Bill. It may be said that those who object to this Bill should do so on special grounds, but that no general argument against limited liability is admissible, seeing that principle has been already adopted by the Legislature. It should be borne in mind that the present proposal is of a very comprehensive character, embracing all partnerships of whatever kind, and seeking to introduce a principle hitherto untried save in special and exceptional cases. It is therefore not only quite fair, but necessary to argue the question in all its bearings. In taking that course we cannot pass over those arguments which are relied upon in support of the principle. In the first place, it is said that limited partnerships would tend to utilize capital and bring forward those dormant stores which timid men will not employ in trade exposed to the risks of the present law. But that argument is of little weight in a country like this, where capital is not only abundant, but in excess. In various foreign countries there may have been a necessity for stimulating the application of capital to trade. Commerce was a sickly plant, and there was no confidence in her operations. It required some limitation of possible loss to induce timid men to expose their property to what were held to be most formidable hazards. But among ourselves such a necessity has never been recognised. Capital has always been abundant for the legitimate objects of trade, and is now more abundant than ever. Let it not be supposed that it is necessary to develop the trade of the country; so far from that being required, a less rapid expansion and development might be desirable in many departments. In all branches of trade the tendency not casual and variable, but normal and uniform is to overtrading. Take, as an instance, the great cotton industry of the north. If all the wheels of Lancashire were again revolving, the consuming power of the world, so far as it has been tested, would not suffice to take off the produce. Capital flows into the channels of trade with no feeble stream, and our policy at the moment seems to be to restrain rather than stimulate the supply.

Another argument for this Bill is addressed to our compassion and generosity. It is said that young men of character and ability, as well as inventors in the arts, would find patrons willing to assist them with limited capital who do not find such supporters under the existing law. The argument is more specious than real. At no time since Britain was a trading country has there been a greater demand for the talents and energies of qualified young men, nor was there ever a greater certainty that such qualities would meet a due reward. No doubt, ardent youths, unwilling to achieve success in the old paths of industry and patience, might at an earlier period enter on the responsibilities of business. But it is most questionable whether the public benefit would be promoted by such a change. The weak point in limited partnerships is, that they encourage rash and speculative trading, and for such enterprises young men, of all others, are the least qualified. The great and most important objection to this Bill is, that it proceeds upon a principle utterly subversive of the law of the country, recognised in innumerable decisions and enforced for many centuries, that every man shall be liable to pay his debts in full. It is said, indeed, by speculative writers, that unlimited liability for debt is not founded on any principle of law, but has been based on the dicta of the Judges. It is needless to inquire into a matter so little practical, as there cannot be any doubt that the English law for centuries has made a debtor liable for his whole debts both in purse and person. But especially is it just that there should be full liability for partnership debts. These are contracted for the benefit of all the co-partners, and thence there arises an equitable obligation that they should be discharged by the joint means and property of all. But while equity clearly points to all the participants or expectants of gain as bound to meet loss, the same principle of equity refuses to sanction any right to devolve such loss on creditors, or, what is the same thing, on the general public. Limited liability is most inequitable in this respect. Lord Overstone, in his paper on limited liability, anno 1837, most justly says—

“In the case of the insolvency of a concern, it removes a portion of the loss, which must be borne by some party, from those who have voluntarily engaged in the concern, and who have had the means of watching and controlling its progress, and who would have been the sole participants in the benefits of its success; for the purpose of throwing it upon those who have had no means of insight into the state of the concern, nor power over its management, and no share in its advantages.”

If commerce could be carried on without loss, there would be no harm in limited liability, but occasional loss being as certain a condition of trade as average gain, why should those who derive the profit not bear the loss? And seeing losses must occur, there can be no advantage in shifting them from the shoulders of the rich to those of the poor; for it may be assumed that poor and struggling tradesmen, compelled by the necessities of their position to give credit and run imprudent risks, will generally be the creditors of limited companies. But I would ask further, where is the equity to merchants as a class in thus sanctioning an invasion of their proper domain by an array of outside competitors? The lawyer or the physician would not like his gains to be shared by any other. His long training, his intellectual acquirements, are all his own. But in the case of the merchant or trader, will it be said that there is no peculiar training, no special aptitudes—the result of labour and effort, requiring powers as distinctive as any other profession, and which only those trained in that school usually possess? Where, then, is the equity of opening up the counting-house or the factory to non-mercantile adventurers? By all means let those become traders, but let them run the risk of trade. The law is not bound to place them in a position for which they are not fitted, and secured by protection which involves injustice to others.

The worst result of limited partnerships will be found to consist in the wholesale immunity which they afford from the legal consequences of debt. It has been said, these companies will tend to the establishment of a system of cash payments, and the abandonment of credit. There can be no greater delusion. Whether we argue on theory or facts, we shall find the very opposite result to be established. Such companies, in their very nature, imply a system of credit. Where there is no debt there is no liability, and no need for legal protection. And, in point of fact, we know that such companies ask and obtain credit with the utmost facility. If the Returns before the House are consulted, there will be found ample proof of the extent to which they have obtained credit, as well as how they have abused it. Doubtless, prudent dealers should refuse to give credit to those who avow that they will be influenced by no honourable considerations and no principles of justice, but that under the shelter of the law they will defraud their creditors. Unfortunately, such is the struggle for business among competing tradesmen, and such are the necessities of dealers to obtain orders, that the greatest risks are eagerly run. Nor need it be wondered at that these companies are favourably regarded. It is part of the system to present an array of respectable names—men known to be rich, and deemed to be prudent, even from the very circumstance that they are trading with limited liability. But, let us look to the facts. On the face of the Returns it is made clear that one-third of these companies have become bankrupt, and left their creditors unpaid. If such was the case under the restricted application of the principle as it has existed since 1855, it may well be anticipated that there will be a fearful increase of insolvency, mismanagement, and swindling, under the proposed extension of the system. Again, the tendency of limited partnerships is to foster excessive and illegitimate competition in trade. No traders are so utterly reckless as those who have nothing to lose. And it would be found that in proportion as risk was limited, there would be a proportionate disregard of prudence and calculation. Wild and rash speculations would be encouraged by the knowledge that failure involved no irretrievable, perhaps no serious result. Under this new law we should see arise innumerable co-partnerships competing with each other in total disregard of consequences, actuated by trade jealousies and rivalships, and rushing on in a career hurtful to themselves, ruinous to others, and destructive of all honest and legitimate trade. Surely, the advocates of this Bill do not wish to see British commerce degraded by this desperate gambling. But we have abundant evidence scattered through the whole of the blue-book, and especially contained in the answers to the queries of the Commissioners, that limited companies, from their very nature, tend to these results. If an example on a large scale were wanted of their needless expenditure and mismanagement, none better can be found than the history of British railways. If the directors of railways had been spending their own money, or even that of their shareholders, unprotected by Acts of Parliament, they never would have gone to such excess in extensions, competing schemes, Parliamentary contests, and legal costs. The hon. Member for Buckingham has borne testimony to the competition of limited companies, and has also instanced railways in confirmation of his views (page 104). It thus appears that we are asked, under pretence of promoting commerce, to adopt a system which will drive prudent merchants from the field. Lastly, this Bill would give a fatal blow to mercantile character and morality. It has been held the glory of a merchant to meet all his engagements with scrupulous honour. I have heard in this House, on more than one occasion, when some exceptional instance of an opposite kind had startled the public mind, language used which seemed to imply that there had been an abandonment of those old principles and traditions which in by-gone times have raised so high the character of the British merchant. Such statements are rash and groundless. No one can know the interior working of that great system of mutual confidence and honour which constitutes British trade, the tens of thousands in value which change hands by a word or a sign, and the security with which, based on well-known forms and customs, the daily routine of affairs proceeds, but must admit that even the lawyer's parchments do not bind faster than the merchant's word. But this state of things may change; and should this Bill become law, it probably will change. It is proposed to make bankruptcy no longer disgraceful. Under this proposed law a capitalist will not content himself with one adventure. We cannot doubt, from what we know of the energy and enterprise of our national character, that we shall find merchants engaged as limited partners in various companies. But no one can expect to be equally successful in all his undertakings. He may be bankrupt in one concern and solvent in another. In what position will that man stand, not legally, for that unfortunately is defined by this Bill, but morally? Will he have incurred the greatest stain which can soil the name of a merchant, or under the demoralizing influence of this new law will he be a bankrupt and not be ashamed? It is only the other day that we have abolished imprisonment for debt. If we go farther back, we shall find the bankrupt treated as a Pariah, and (at least in the North) clothed in a debtor's garment, of which he could not divest himself until he had purged the stain of debt, and become entitled to take his place among honourable men. I have not a word to say in favour of such obsolete barbarisms, but there is no reason why we should go to the opposite extreme, by enacting that bankruptcy shall be no longer a stain, and bankrupts incur no social disqualification. There is a law in the statute book, 52 Geo. III., c. 144, which requires a new writ to be issued in lieu of any bankrupt who may have a seat in this House, and that law has not been repealed by any subsequent amending or consolidating Acts. The position of an insolvent who has failed to meet his engagements in one or many limited companies, will be peculiar and anomalous in regard to this law. What course you, Sir, might think it necessary to follow in fulfilment of your duty, I will not pretend to say; but this I think I may say, that there should be no limited liability resting on the Members of this House to maintain its honour and its dignity, and these will be best defended by rejecting this Bill. I hope to learn from Her Majesty's Government that they are prepared to adopt that course.

Mr. Buchanan

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. GREGSON said, he rose to second the Amendment. He was opposed to the principle of limited liability, and went upon the old English principle, that if a man contracted a debt, he ought to be made to pay, unless he became insolvent. The Act of last Session only passed in August, and came into operation in November, and they ought to have experience of the working of that Act before they legislated further in the same direction. He did not see why the same principles should not be applied to joint-stock companies that were applied to railway companies, in respect to which there was a standing order of the House, that they should not borrow any money till 50 per cent of the capital was paid up, and then not more than one-third of the capital.

Mr. MILNER GIBSON said, the hon. Gentleman who had moved the rejection of the Bill, and the hon. Gentleman who had seconded that Motion, had both argued against the general principle of limited liability. Now, he thought he was entitled to assume that the general principle of limited liability had been adopted by the House, and it was not necessary, in dealing with the question before them, to argue that general principle. What they had to consider was how the hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill proposed to apply that general principle to this particular measure, and what were the safeguards and provisions he had introduced. With regard to the various provisions contained in the Bill, as the hon. Member proposed to refer it to a Select Committee, it was hardly necessary to go into the details. He agreed in the general proposition, that a man ought to be able, with proper safeguards, to advance money on the condition that his interest should depend upon the profits, without being liable to be considered a partner. And workmen, he thought, ought to be allowed to be paid by sharing in the profits of their employer, without being considered partners. But he agreed with the hon. Member (Mr. Buchanan), that if a person were to be allowed to share in the profits of a concern without being subject to unlimited liability, he ought to take no share in the management, and in that respect he thought the Bill was defective. He believed that was the principle of the French law as to partnerships en commandite. There were some provisions in the Bill which he wished to guard himself from being supposed to sanction. The hon. Member wished to have all disputes between partners terminated by compulsory arbitration. He (Mr. Milner Gibson) thought they should be allowed to decide matters for themselves. He strongly objected to that part of the Bill which provided for the registration of all firms in the United Kingdom carrying on business under any other designation that the full Christian and surname of every one of the partners. The registration of all those firms would be a very formidable affair. The present joint-stock companies office in connection with the Board of Trade would be totally inadequate; and if to carry out that provision it was necessary to have a central office in London, with local officers all over the country, it would require an office in London as large as the Bank of England. At the same time, he thought there were provisions in the Bill well worthy of consideration, and consistent with the general principle of limited liability already adopted by the Legislature. Therefore, he would vote for the second reading, the more especially as the hon. Gentleman proposed to refer the Bill to a Select Committee.

Mr. Gregson

Mr. MALINS said, that he could not see any principle on which, if they allowed limited liability to seven or eight, they could deny it to two or three. [An hon. MEMBER: Or one.] He denied that the principle of limited liability had signally failed. On the contrary, he contended, as a practical man, that it had been a signal success. The proof was the almost invariable practice of starting new companies on that principle. It was a great benefit that people could put a certain sum in a concern; and even if that was lost, that they need not necessarily be ruined. But it was said that the creditors were defrauded. That, however, was a great mistake; all that the new law had done was to teach people prudence and foresight. He denied, also, that the limited liability companies had all failed. Many of them had achieved a brilliant success, and some of them would never have been started at all on any other principle. Would any one, for example, have ever thought of projecting the splendid hotels which had lately been set on foot if the law had not been altered? It was not necessary to discuss the details of the Bill, because it was to be sent before a Select Committee, but he greatly approved of the proposal to enable servants to be paid by a percentage without being thereby made partners, or to allow persons lending money to be paid by a fluctuating interest without leading to the same result. He should cordially support the second reading.

Mr. T. BARING said, that the old principle upon which English commerce had been carried on was, that every man who shared the profits should also be answerable for the losses of the trading; and if there were concerns which required an accumulation of capital beyond the means of individuals, a Royal Charter would confer limited liability. So far was the principle of limited liability from leading to the exercise of greater caution, that it would diminish care and must lead to inflated speculation. Under the old system the trader was required to look to his liabilities; under the Bill that responsibility was to be thrown upon the creditor. It was under the old system that the reputation, honour, and credit of the English merchant had grown up, and good reason ought to be shown before it was altered. Unlimited liability had hitherto been done away with only with regard to large companies; and its abolition with regard to every transaction and every concern, however small, must introduce great distrust into commercial transactions, and would probably lead to great losses, calamities, and disasters. If he had wanted reasons for opposing the Bill, he should have found them in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, whose remarks were sufficient to show that this was a most crude, undigested, and unsatisfactory measure. He objected to almost every clause of the Bill, and only justified his vote for the second reading on the ground that something might be made of it in Committee. That, however, was not the way to treat a subject of such grave importance. The last Limited Liability Bill which was presented to the House was introduced by the Government, and yet it was altered at least five or six times; and if the Bill before them ought to have been brought in at all, it ought to have appeared under similar auspices. The House ought not to alter the whole foundation of commercial security on the Motion of a private Member, without the consideration and without the sanction of the Government. Without such sanction the Bill ought not even to go to a Select Committee. Select Committees might very well deal with the details of measures upon the principle of which the House was agreed, but in this case the details involved the whole principle of the Bill. The reason why the system of commandite was adopted in France was, that it was impossible to raise sufficient capital to carry on the trade of the country without securing men against complete liability. In this country, however, no such necessity existed. The House ought to hesitate before it moved one straw which would shake the commercial credit of England; and although he did not question the good intention with which this Bill had been introduced, he doubted whether it would facilitate sound and honest trade, and he should vote against the second reading.

MR. MILNER GIBSON explained that he had expressed his concurrence in two of the main principles of the Bill—that persons might advance money to a trading concern, receiving by way of interest a share of the profits, without being constituted partners, and that servants might under similar conditions be paid by a share of such profits. He thought that these provisions might be accompanied by sufficient safeguards, and therefore felt himself at liberty to vote for the second reading of the Bill.

MR. BAZLEY said, he looked upon limited liability as a great evil. It was true that the principle was recognised in the case of joint-stock companies, but for individuals and small associations of half-a-dozen persons the principle was untried, and would, in his opinion, be most injurious to sound trade in this country. He should therefore give his hearty support to the Amendment.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, that as the law stood there was not the least practical difficulty in remunerating clerks by a salary proportioned to profits without incurring the risk of partnership, so that no amendment of the law was necessary in that respect. As to the proposal that persons should be allowed to lend money and receive a share of profits without thereby becoming partners, he recollected that in 1855-6 an attempt was made to provide for loans such as the Bill contemplated; but, after full discussion, everybody who considered the subject came to the conclusion that the principle of limited liability might be safely introduced in respect of companies, but not of persons advancing loans. The company was required to announce itself as formed on the principle of limited liability, and those who dealt with it were thus put on their guard, and were enabled to ascertain from the registry, if they thought fit, what was the capital of the concern and who were liable. With regard to private partnerships, however, it was impossible to introduce any system of that kind. Suppose a firm established in Manchester or Glasgow, or in places more remote, how were the persons dealing with it to know that the firm was kept afloat by loans from persons who were not partners? How could persons, before entering into transactions with such a firm, send up to London and search the register for information? Then, again, it was not possible that the Joint-Stock Company's Office could register every petty loan made to firms throughout the kingdom. That office could not perform the work. The Bill contained no provisions by which the public would be put on their guard and informed who were lending money upon the principle of limited liability. He regretted that the Board of Trade, to whom the mercantile public naturally looked for protection, were willing to allow a measure of such grave importance to be scrambled for in a Select Committee, instead of introducing it, if they really approved its principle, upon their own responsibility.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that the opponents of this measure seemed to have addressed themselves to the defects of details much more than to the question whether the principle involved was a sound one. That, as he understood, was the point to be determined at that moment; for the mere fact that a Bill contained clauses requiring amendment, or that additional safeguards were necessary, afforded no reason why the Bill should not be read a second time. He agreed that private partnerships on the principle of limited liability should be ear-marked as such, and that that fact should appear in all their notices; but the want of such a provision was a matter of detail which might easily be supplied when the Bill was in Committee. The question before the House was whether an amendment of the law of private partnerships, as regarded that point, was not needed. The House had been told of a distinction so fine that even the framer of the Bill had failed to grasp it. The language of the clause assumed the law to be what it was not—assumed that a clerk would be liable as a partner when he would not; while the marginal note put the matter on its true footing. If a clerk were paid in proportion to profits, and received a salary in the ratio of profits, he was not a partner; but if he received a share of profits, he was liable as a partner. Again, a man might furnish the whole capital of a trading partnership, and take securities for repayment; and if he stipulated for 15 or 20 per cent of interest, instead of a moderate share of profits, he was not a partner. Did the hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring) really think that the mercantile morality of the country depended upon the maintenance of such a state of the law? He thought that a Bill which got rid of these absurd and irrational distinctions would be of real service to the commercial community, and the requisite safeguards which were omitted might easily be supplied. It was requisite that persons dealing with these companies should know upon what principle they were based, and it was also necessary that those who furnished the capital should not be at liberty suddenly to withdraw it. But to get rid of the anomalies he had mentioned was not a task unworthy of this House, nor did the Government think it right to discourage private Members in the duty which they had taken upon themselves. It seemed to the Government, therefore, right to assent to the second reading of the Bill, while they hoped that it would be greatly improved in Committee, and while they by no means bound themselves to support its passing into law in its present shape.

Sir Hugh Cairns

MR. WHITESIDE thought his hon. and learned Friend who had just sat down, had rather offered an apology for the Bill than adduced sound arguments in favour of its principle. He should, he might add, like to know whether it was beneath the dignity of the Board of Trade to take so important a question as that with which the Bill proposed to deal under its consideration, and signalize the present humdrum Session by introducing with respect to it a measure worthy the serious attention of Parliament. As for the measure under discussion, he would appeal to his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General, to say whether he would put his name to it without having the slightest doubt as to the answer which he should receive. If, he should like to know, John Smith commenced trade, having borrowed £100,000 from the hon. Member for Birmingham, while he was to be paid by a share in the profits, how were the general public to become aware that John Smith had no capital? His hon. and learned Friend seemed to think everything in the Bill was a matter of detail, but he appeared to forget that the value of such a measure consisted in the way in which its details were worked out. If each Gentleman who had spoken had pointed out a radical defect in the Bill, it was in vain for the right hon. President of the Board of Trade to say that something could be made of it in Committee. That was not a rational and scientific mode of law-making. He hoped the good sense of the House would remit the matter to the Board of Trade, and that that Board would signalize itself for the Session by doing something useful.

MR. JACKSON said, he should oppose the Bill, as it was in favour of the capitalist, and not in favour of the trader and man of industry. The tendency of the Bill was to uproot that principle which gave England its greatness—the credit which one man gave to another. He believed that credit would cease if the Bill were to pass into a law. Had it not been for the assistance given to him when a young man, he would never in all probability have become a Member of that House. It had, he might add, been his practice to bestow upon those in his employ a portion of his profits as an inducement to exertion, but he at the same time never supposed that he was thereby making them his partners.

MR. SEELY said, he admitted that great capitalists might be injured by the operations of the Bill, but he thought it would tend to benefit the public at large. It would not injure the prospects of young men, as the hon. Gentleman who spoke last seemed to suppose. He should support the Bill.

MR. ALDERMAN SIDNEY said, he was at a loss to understand why the Bill had been introduced, as he believed it to be fraught with considerable danger and inconvenience; while the existing law did not, in his opinion, stand in need of amendment in the direction which it proposed.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 56; Noes 39: Majority 17.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^d, and committed for Tomorrow.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS BILL.—[BILL 68.]—CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. VANCE said, he objected to the clause which enacted that a person found guilty of bribery in a court of law should be declared incapable of being elected or sitting in Parliament for five years. He thought that the punishment would be ample if the person so convicted should be incapable of being elected during the then existing Parliament. He would therefore move to leave out Clause 11, and to insert the following:

Clause (Any person who shall be convicted of bribery at any Election shall be incapable of being elected or sitting in Parliament at any time during the then existing Parliament).

Clause brought up, and read 1^o.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

MR. WHITESIDE said, he objected to the clause as it stood, inasmuch as if a Committee of the House had decided in favour of a Member, yet, if a jury thought fit to give a verdict for a £10 penalty against him, his seat would be vacated, and he would be incapacitated from being elected for five years.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the 17 & 18 Vict., c. 102, already perpetually disqualified from voting all electors who might be proved guilty of bribery or undue influence, and the question was whether the same measure should not be meted out to candidates. Undoubtedly, under the clause, though a Member might be declared duly seated by an Election Committee, yet if subsequently he were proved guilty of bribery and treating, or undue influence, before a court of law, and a penalty were recovered against him, he would be obliged to vacate his seat.

MR. AYRTON said, that the true nature of the clause was a complete abandonment of the privileges of the House of Commons to reserve to itself the power of declaring the right to a seat in the House, and not to permit a court of justice to interfere in the matter. Would the House reverse all past legislation, and submit to the absolute judgment of any court which might happen to have jurisdiction, to determine whether a Member should continue to sit in the House. The higher court was to have its judgment reversed by the lower court, without knowing the ground upon which the reversal proceeded. Upon a judgment of bribery being placed upon the table of the House, a new writ was to issue without the House having power to ask a question, although the judgment might be the result of the most scandalous and most collusive action, and the proceedings in it most offensive to the honour and character of the House. Upon the part of his constituents he must protest against such legislation in an absurd fit of indignation, and would call on the House to maintain its own dignity.

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN said, that it was monstrous that the decision of a Committee of the House might be reversed by the most partisan and corrupt petty jury which could be collected for the purpose.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, that although there might be a bias in a jury, there was no great superiority in that respect in a Committee of the House of Commons. It was often said, that if they knew who was to constitute a Committee, they could tell what its decision would be. He should support the clause.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that whatever course the House might think fit to take, the subject was one which required more consideration than it had received. It was important, in a constitutional point of view, that the House should retain in its own hands the power to decide on the validity of the qualification of its Members; and although the verdict of a jury in a case of felony disqualified the person against whom it was found, no one could imagine that there would be any tendency in the minds of the jury to be influenced by the contemplation of that event. But it was impossible to say, that if the verdict of a jury on a question of bribery would unseat a Member, it might not have influence on the jury so as to affect their judgment. Under these circumstances, he would suggest to his hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire to withdraw the clause.

MR. PULLER said, he felt that after what had been said by the hon. and learned Solicitor General he ought to withdraw the clause, and therefore he should adopt that course.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendments made.

Bill to be read 3^o on Thursday.

MILITIA PAY BILL.

Bill to defray the Charge of the Pay, Clothing, and contingent and other Expenses of the Disembodied Militia in Great Britain and Ireland; to grant Allowances in certain cases to Subaltern Officers, Adjutants, Paymasters, Quartermasters, Surgeons, Assistant Surgeons, and Surgeons Mates of the Militia; and to authorize the Employment of the Non-commissioned Officers, ordered to be brought in by Mr. MASSIE, Sir GEORGE LEWIS, and The JUDGE ADVOCATE.

House adjourned at one o'clock.

Mr. Ayrton

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, March 25, 1863.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Resolution in Committee—Wear Navigation and Sunderland Docks (Stamp Duties on Proxies).

Committee—Salmon Fisheries (Ireland) [Bill 1].

Debate (March 4) resumed, and again adjourned.

Select Committee—Partnership Law Amendment [Bill 26].

Third Reading—Inclosure [Bill 58], and passed.

SALMON FISHERIES (IRELAND) BILL. COMMITTEE. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [4th March], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair;" and which Amendment was, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be committed to a Select Committee,"—(Lord Fermanagh)—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. CONOLLY said, he acknowledged some legislation was still required on this subject, but he conceived that there was no ground for the sweeping measure proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Wexford (Mr. M'Mahon) and he trusted the House would refuse it its support. He conceived that the Act of 1842 was judicious and effective, and he believed that no case had been made out for repealing it—for that, in fact, was the object of the hon. and learned Member's Bill. The marrow of this measure lay in two clauses. The object of one of those clauses was to prohibit certain engines for taking fish, and among them were those going under the description of fixed engines. The prohibition of those fixed engines in all the tidal waters of Ireland would, in fact, amount to the confiscation of property yielding £100,000 a year, although the right to the engines producing that large revenue had been legally established by the Act of 1842. He certainly did not think that the House would at once, and without grave reason, accept a clause of such a sweeping nature. It appeared from official Returns, that under the Act of 1842, which the present Bill sought to repeal, the progress of the salmon fishery had been, from 1852 to 1862, one of gradual improvement, with the exception of the two years 1860 and 1861. The Report of the Commissioners for 1862 was not yet on the table of the House; but he was able to say, from his own knowledge, that the decline manifested in the two late years had now very much ceased, and a decided recovery had taken place. Still he was not prepared to deny that there had been an over-catch of salmon, and that some legislation was needed to check the abuse; but he did deny that there was any necessity for this measure. Indeed, it appeared from the Returns that the fishing on the part of the cotmen, who constituted the interest which the hon. and learned promoter of the Bill stood forward to defend, had increased in a greater ratio than that of any other interest. While admitting that legislation was desirable, he objected to the subject being dealt with by a private Member, for he thought it was one that should be taken up by the Government. The other clause, which he had before mentioned as forming an important part of the Bill, referred to chartered weirs or milldams. He had obtained information which showed that the rivers best stocked with salmon were those fished under ancient charters. He trusted, therefore, that the House would not sanction any interference with those rights. It was the duty of the Government to regulate and restrain over-fishing, but they ought not to countenance the sweeping confiscation of existing rights.

Mr. DAWSON believed that it was desirable to legislate on this subject, but that the present Bill would be neither satisfactory in regard to public, nor just to private interests. He must protest against the confiscation of property on which large sums of money had been spent, and the overthrowing of arrangements on the faith of the durability of which leases had been granted. He held that compensation must form an essential element in any settlement of this question, and regretted that no provision was made for it in the Bill. In his opinion, however, the Government would alone be able to accomplish any effectual reform of the Irish fisheries; and the best way of meeting the case would be to issue a Royal Commission, which would take evidence on the spot, would inquire into the validity of private rights or quasi-rights, the interests involved, and the compensation which ought to be given in each case. The assertion that salmon were on the increase in Ireland, could only apply to the mouths of rivers. In the upper waters there was a lamentable deficiency of fish, and in some places the breed had become almost extinct. For instance, at Lough Neagh, which, with the exception of the Lake of Geneva and a Russian lake, was the largest sheet of fresh water in Europe, and was fed by thirty-six streams, it was only at the mouth of the Bann, and within three or four miles of the sea, that fish were caught. In the upper waters, on the other hand, the fish were found, rari nantes in gurgite vasto, and the sight of one was quite a novelty. The deleterious matter which was introduced by the flax manufacturers into the rivers had a very injurious effect on the salmon. A Royal Commission ought to be appointed to inquire into the various questions at issue in this matter; but, in the mean time, he should support the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone.

COLONEL WHITE said, he had a proposal to make on this subject, which he hoped would be accepted. He, for one, was sincerely anxious to improve the fisheries in Ireland; but so long as the question remained in the hands of the hon. and learned Member for Wexford, that object would not be accomplished, because the lower proprietors would never submit to be deprived of their property by a Bill introduced by a private Member, though in the hands of Government some chance of an ultimate agreement existed. What he would suggest was, that the debate should be adjourned, and that ten Gentlemen—five representing the lower and five the upper proprietors, with a member of the legal profession as assessor—should meet in the tea room for the purpose of endeavouring to frame a Bill which should be satisfactory to all parties, and which the Government should be asked to introduce and pass into a law. He was persuaded, that if his suggestion were agreed to by the promoters of the present Bill, the lower proprietors would meet them in the fairest spirit, and would be ready to make great sacrifices in order to insure the passing of a well-considered measure. He would move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BAGWELL seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the debate be now adjourned.”

Mr. LONGFIELD said, he could hardly believe that the hon. and gallant Member was serious in the proposal he had made. The indifference of the Government, as manifested by the state of the Treasury benches, on a subject involving so largely the interests of Ireland, showed that nothing could be expected from them, and warranted any private Member in trying to legislate to the best of his ability. He maintained that the present Bill was called for, that it was just and necessary, that it did not interfere with private property in any way, and that there was no occasion to refer it to a Select Committee, or to have an inquiry by a Royal Commission. At one time the upper and lower proprietors had nearly the same rights, but the latter soon evinced a disposition to grasp at what did not belong to them; and about two centuries ago, an Act was passed to check their "greedy appetites and insatiable desires." Up to 1841, stake-weirs and bag-nets were clearly illegal; and a decision given in that year to that effect rendered some new legislation necessary for the stake-weir owners, and hence the Bill of 1842. Great praise had been bestowed upon the Select Committee to which that measure was referred, and of which the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone was a Member; but he contended that it entirely disregarded the rights of the public, attending exclusively to those of private individuals. The Members were guided solely, not indeed corruptly, but naturally, by their own interests, from which they never deviated in a single instance, and at once decided, without evidence of any kind, that the erection of stake-weirs was thenceforth to be allowed. No wonder that the effect of the Bill, when converted into an Act, was to give an unlimited latitude to the erection of stake-weirs and bag-nets everywhere. In 1851 a long correspondence took place between the Fishery Commissioners and the Board of Admiralty, complaints having been made against the former for not putting into operation the powers with which they were vested in respect to the erection of weirs. The result was, that an Inspector was sent down to examine the state of two estuaries, the Bride and Blackwater. The Inspector ultimately reported that those rivers were actually studded with weirs, all of which were illegal; and the Board of Admiralty was called upon to interfere. It appeared, however, that neither the Fishery Commissioners nor the Board of Admiralty would interfere in the matter, although it was proved that those weirs were wholly illegal, and had seriously impeded the navigation of the rivers in which they were erected; so that those two bodies, who were paid largely to watch over and protect the public interests in such matters, wholly ignored their duty on that occasion. The same was the case with the river Shannon. In that noble river a number of powerful individuals—such as the hon. and gallant Member for Kidderminster and Lord Monteaigle, and many others—had for their own private purposes erected these illegal engines, to the general prejudice of the rights of the public, and to the great injury of the navigation. He had great respect, but no compassion, for the hon. and gallant Member for Kidderminster (Colonel White), who possessed what were called rights of property in some of these weirs. That gallant Gentleman, who was connected with the Treasury, as well as other Members of both Houses of Parliament who were owners of these nuisances, were admirably taken care of, but the interests of the public and the poor were sacrificed. The influence of these powerful individuals prevailed, while the duty of protecting the general community was bandied from one Department to another, and, of course, in the end wholly disregarded. The fact of the King's turnspit being a Member of Parliament had once prevented a reform in the Royal Household, and in that House they had now many turnspits, whose resistance to improvement was seriously felt on the present question. The supporters of this Bill had been recommended to intrust the matter to the Government; but when he looked to the empty Treasury bench, and saw not a single soul there, save the hon. and gallant Member for Kidderminster himself, he could hardly think that a very safe and impartial tribunal to which to appeal. The Select Committee of last year which examined this question included three ex-Secretaries of Ireland (Sir W. Somerville, Mr. Herbert, and Lord Naas) besides the present acting Chief Secretary, who was not now in his place. The stake-weir and bag-net proprietors were also well represented on that Committee, whose decision was arrived at after hearing witness of the highest experience on both sides, and after looking carefully into all the evidence and documents collected on the subject between the years 1842 and 1862. The present Chief Secretary was chosen a Member of the Committee in order that he might bring to the inquiry the weight, if not of his official experience, at least of his official position ; but the right hon. Baronet had neglected to attend its sittings, and declined to avail himself of the means of information there afforded to him on the subject on which he now came forward to legislate. The hon. and gallant Member for Kidderminster followed him as his shadow, and the right hon. Baronet, knowing that his friend was in peril, rushed to his rescue. Hence those well-known clauses proposed by him as amendments, but which were a repetition of the Act of 1842. The Committee of 1862 came to the conclusion that it was fair and right to legislate as was proposed to be done by this Bill, abolishing all stake-weirs and bag-nets not sanctioned by Act of Parliament, or by express grant of the Crown, on the ground that they had become an absolute public nuisance which, if continued, threatened soon to extinguish the breed of salmon in the rivers of Ireland, as had been proved by experience in the case of England and Scotland. These obstructions had nothing like the legal rights of property, and ought to be swept away. The making of gaps in weirs for the sake of navigation, leaving full and free access to the upper waters of the rivers, had been found greatly to multiply the quantity of fish, and thus to benefit those who had mistakenly resisted it. The framers of this Bill wished to legislate for the interest not of any one class, but of the entire public ; they had not sought to minister to the greed and avarice of the few, but to the real advantage of the commonwealth, and he earnestly hoped that the House would ratify their principles.

Mr. Longfield

Mr. MACDONOGH said, that this subject, being one of deep importance to the interests of Ireland and the empire at large, ought to be discussed in a calm and judicial spirit, and not in a spirit of personality and prejudice. He therefore regretted the acerbity of tone which had marked the speech of the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. Longfield) who seemed to be dissatisfied with every tribunal which had examined this question, save the Committee of 1862. The generality of his censure took from it its chief sting. For his own part, he did not look to the personal interests of the lower, the middle, or the upper proprietors, but to the improvement of the salmon fisheries of Ireland and the interests of the public at large ; and having listened to the able statement of the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone (Lord Fermoy), he felt bound to vote for his proposal as to a Select Committee, thinking that inquiry should precede legislation. He had been astonished to hear it said that this Bill did not trench on private rights, because its fourth and fifth sections taken together enacted that there should be an open gap in every stone weir—a provision clearly invading the vested rights in weirs, founded on Royal charters granted from the earliest times. The Sovereigns of England had a right to make these grants, because those fisheries were vested in the Crown prior to Magna Charta. There being, then, clearly vested rights in these weirs, it became the House to approach the question with calm temper and judgment, such as would enable them to arrive at something like a just and fair compromise of the matter. There being, as he contended, vested rights in these weirs, it followed that any gaps created in them by subsequent legislation was a violation of those rights. The 5 & 6 Vict. prohibited the opening of any such gaps unless the proprietors had been compensated, and that was a just principle of legislation. Then as to the rights more recently acquired, he did not go the length of asserting that the 5 & 6 Vict. conferred rights of property as indefeasible as the titles given by the Incumbered Estates Court ; but it conferred certain rights in weirs, stake-nets, and bag-nets under certain circumstances, and those rights, having been confirmed by subsequent statutes, had been bought and sold and made the subject of settlements. From the best sources of information he was enabled to state that there never was before a larger supply of salmon than existed at this moment in Ireland ; and there was clear evidence that the export of salmon from Ireland had greatly increased since the passing of the Act 5 & 6 Vict. ; but as most contradictory statements had been made, further inquiry was needed before adopting any fresh legislation. The Report of the Commissioners in 1852 recommended a consolidating statute to be brought in by the Government. No such statute had been passed, but he hoped even now that the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for Ireland would take up the subject, and deal with it, instead of allowing it to be dealt with by private Members. The advocates of the Bill had talked of statistics justifying such legislation ; but the statistics had never been produced, and if such did exist they should be submitted to a

Select Committee who would fairly inquire into their accuracy. The hon. and learned Member for Mallow had thought fit to impugn the conduct of the Committee of 1842, which was a subject of regret, as the introduction of personalities into debate was very objectionable. But he did not believe that the distinguished men who formed that Committee had been influenced by selfish motives, and no ground for such a charge had been shown to exist. There was no doubt that the Committee which sat last year had acted according to what they conceived to be their duty, but the hon. and gallant Member for Clare (Colonel Vandeleur) had told the House that he wished to examine several important witnesses, but the Committee refused to adjourn for a single day to enable him to produce them. How could English Members be expected to decide upon a question respecting which such conflicting statements were made, without a preliminary inquiry before a Select Committee? He believed that the balance of testimony was in favour of the success of past legislation, but he did not desire to determine that point himself, and therefore urged the necessity of obtaining further information.

Mr. ESMONDE said, a noble Friend of his (Lord Stuart de Decies) had been spoken of as an innovator upon the river Blackwater, and he had been requested by that noble Lord to state that not a single weir upon the Blackwater was in his hands, and that of those in the hands of his tenants not one, he believed, could be regarded as an encroachment. With regard to the question before the House, he supported the Motion for adjourning the debate, not because he wished to cause delay, but because the lower proprietors desired to have inquiry before legislation, and they had not been heard before the Committee of last year. He thought, too, that this was a subject which the Government should undertake to deal with, as they had done in the case of the Scotch fisheries. He objected to the description of the Bill as being intended to assimilate the laws relating to salmon fisheries in England and Ireland, because in England rights that had existed from time immemorial had been respected. In the English Bill provision was made for compensating those rights which were interfered with or prejudiced in its operation; whereas by the present Bill, while existing rights were swept away, the question of compensation was altogether omitted. The Committee which sat last year had refused to examine some witnesses, and therefore he was of opinion that another investigation of this subject should take place.

Mr. Macdonogh

Mr. GEORGE thought the measure of his hon. and learned Colleague was one of spoliation and destruction of existing rights guaranteed by Act of Parliament, without the slightest approach to compensation in favour of the injured parties. He deprecated the personal allusions made by the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. Longfield) to men as high-minded and as honourable as himself, and as free from the suspicion of improper motives or personal considerations when adjudicating upon questions affecting the interests of their fellow countrymen. It was monstrous to say that those weirs were contrary to Act of Parliament. He insisted that they were fully warranted by Act of Parliament. If those weirs were illegal, he asked why they were allowed to exist from 1847 up to the present moment without any order or authority from the Irish Judges, before whom the question had repeatedly come, to abolish them. He could not help thinking that the representatives of the Government in Ireland were guilty of a grave dereliction of duty in allowing an important question like that before the House to be discussed without their intervention, or any attempt on their part to correct the confusion in which the House was placed upon this subject, a confusion arising from the discordant opinions that had been expressed as to the interests of the one party or the other involved in this matter. The subject was of sufficient magnitude and importance to be dealt with by the responsible advisers of the Crown, and he therefore trusted that Her Majesty's Government would take it up, and introduce a Bill which, while it would meet existing evils, would protect existing rights.

LORD FERMOY said, he rose to defend the course he had adopted as a Member of the Committee of 1842. The Members of that Committee had been attacked by the hon. and learned Member for Mallow (Mr. Longfield), who had attributed corrupt motives to them; but he thought that a mention of their names would be considered a sufficient refutation of the charge. It included the late Judge Jackson, the present Irish Chief Baron, the Recorder of Dublin, Mr. Conolly, Mr. O'Connell, Sir Robert Ferguson, and other Members from Ireland. The Bill was not hurried through Parliament. It was printed in 1841, and, after the country had had time to consider it, it was, in 1842, referred to a Select Committee. The first vote he (Lord Fermoy) gave in that Committee was directly opposed to his personal interest. Mr Conolly and Mr. Jackson had introduced a Bill to abolish stake-nets and weirs, and in the Committee a compromise was arrived at, whereby those stake-nets and weirs were legalized, with limitations. The Bill itself was a compromise, and as such the Committee regarded it. None of the fishing interests asked to give evidence, such was the confidence entertained by all parties in the impartiality of the Members of the Committee, who had ample information before them. The Committee of last year had heard evidence; but their policy was not such as entitled them to the confidence of the country; for they had not heard the evidence on one side as fully as they had heard that on the other. Surely a Committee which had taken some evidence was entitled to more confidence than a Committee which had taken no evidence at all. This was a case for compromise. If the stake-weirs and bag-nets were illegal, why did not the Government put them down? The House was asked to prejudge the legal question, for the Bill before them declared those engines to be illegal. He did not believe that the effect of this Bill would be to increase the number of salmon or to benefit the upper proprietors. In his opinion, its effect would be to quadruple the property of the owners of certain lax-weirs in Ireland. He was in favour of a principle which would give every one a fair supply in the first instance; but when a good general supply had been obtained, he would then allow those persons who were entitled to fish for salmon to catch them in the best way they could for a certain time. Proper precautions should, of course, be taken for keeping up the breed. Enormous quantities of fish were destroyed by millers. Why was there no outcry against that by the promoters of the Bill now under consideration? On the upper waters every man's hand was against the salmon, and there was no one to protect them. The little that was done in the way of protection was under an Act of 1844. He hoped the question would be taken up by the Government; for by them only could the necessary compromise be effected. He believed salmon might be increased a hundredfold in Ireland within ten years. If the Government gave him a pledge that they would take the subject up, he should withdraw his Amendment for referring the Bill to a Select Committee.

Mr. WHITESIDE said, the salmon was a very interesting fish, and the object of everybody was to increase the supply of that fish, not for the purpose of preserving, but for the purpose of consuming it; but it was very desirable that the discussion should now take a practical shape, and he thought, that if the Government would take up the question, they would be able to discover a solution of these difficulties. What would be the practical effect of this debate? He thought they ought to close it as soon as possible. The point about which they were all anxious was to get as much salmon as they could, and the first thing to be done was to prevent the premature destruction of the fish. Upon the small rivers it certainly appeared that the fish were decreasing by the engines now in use. It was true that a Parliamentary title must be respected; but public rights ought also to be considered, and in doing so, perhaps, the individuals who were now so busy in agitating this question might be themselves benefited by legislation. He suggested that during the Easter recess the Government should take the subject into consideration, and that the right hon. Baronet should employ his vacation in thinking upon a matter which was of so much importance to Ireland. If the right hon. Gentleman would bring forward a well-considered Bill, he might depend upon it receiving from that side of the House a calm and dispassionate consideration.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE agreed with those who wished that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Robert Peel) should take the matter into consideration, and prevent, if he could, the unseemly spectacle of what might be called an Irish row upon a subject really of national importance. He maintained that it was in the shallow waters that the great damage to the salmon was done; and until the fish were properly preserved in the upper waters, the supply would not be so abundant as it ought to be. To do away with the sea fisheries would be to do a great public injury, and would be depriving of certain employment a large number of poor persons. The proprietors of these fisheries required no unfair advantage, but based their claims on the broad basis of law, justice, and equity.

COLONEL VANDELEUR said, that the object of the hon. and learned Member for Wexford (Mr. M'Mahon) seemed to be to consider the advantage not of the poor people, but of the monopolists. The name of the public was often used when some bit of a job was to be done for somebody else. He (Colonel Vandeleur) was one of the proprietors of the Lower Shannon. He did not derive much advantage from it, but there were others who did, and he considered this Bill one of the most monstrous acts of spoliation ever attempted. He had often been astonished how an hon. and learned Gentleman, who himself had very little interest in Ireland, could volunteer to make an attempt amounting to little less than plunder. The proprietors whose rights were now attacked held under repeated Acts of Parliament, and they ought not to be exposed to these continued attacks upon interests as well established as any in the kingdom. This question of navigation had been very much strained by the supporters of the Bill. If the Admiralty interfered in Ireland, why should they not interfere in England and Scotland? He denied that the number of fish had fallen off; on the contrary, the statistics showed that they had increased. Of course, there were bad and good seasons. If there were a wet autumn, there was good fishing, and vice versa. He hoped the House would not sanction any attack on the vested rights of proprietors.

COLONEL DUNNE pointed out that the whole day had been wasted in a fruitless discussion, and expressed his opinion that they would never arrive at a useful result by continuing the debate. It would be better to accept the suggestion thrown out by the hon. and gallant Member for Kidderminster (Colonel White), to choose a Committee composed of gentlemen connected with both interests, and a few English Members who had no bias either way. There were great and conflicting interests at stake, and concessions would certainly have to be made on both sides. This was the only way of getting out of the difficulty, and he preferred it very much to appealing to the Government—for the Amendments put on the paper by the Irish Secretary had given general dissatisfaction, or for Irish Members making speeches for the purpose of wasting the time of the House.

Mr. MONSELL agreed with the hon. and gallant Colonel that there had been great waste of time in discussing the Bill, but did not believe that the method he had pointed out would lead to the settlement of the question. Without the assistance of the Government it was impossible that a Bill settling this question could be passed, and he appealed to the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for Ireland to take the matter up. If he would do so, he and many other Irish Members would give him all the support in their power. The interests at stake were so varied that only the Government could reconcile them; and unless they undertook the duty, there would be great risk of the Session passing by without a remedy being provided for the great and proved evils which existed. By proper legislation the supply of salmon in Ireland might be enormously increased, and it would be a source of great wealth to that country, and especially to the people employed in the fisheries.

Colonel Vandeleur

Mr. HASSARD said, he joined in the wish of the hon. Member for Limerick, that the Government should take the matter of these fisheries into their own hands, or nothing would be done this Session—

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate was further adjourned till To-morrow.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

Order for Committee read.

Mr. PEEL moved that the House go into Committee of Supply for the purpose of voting certain sums on account for the Civil Service.

Mr. AUGUSTUS SMITH objected to any Votes being taken when the Estimates had not been laid before the House.

Committee deferred till To-morrow.

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, March 26, 1863.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Inclosure (No. 58); Marine Mutiny; Augmentation of Benefices (No. 59).

Second Reading—Mutiny; Tobacco Duties (No. 56).

Committee—Post Office Savings Banks (No. 47). Report—Births and Deaths Registration (Ireland) (No. 57).

GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY (NEW METROPOLITAN STATION AND BRANCHES) BILL.

SECOND READING. DEBATE RESUMED.

Adjourned Debate [March 12] on the Motion, That the said Bill be now read 2^d, and the Amendment thereto, "That the said Bill be read a Second Time on this day Six Months,"—(The Earl of Shaftesbury,)—resumed (according to Order).

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, the best speech he could make against this Bill would be to read section 17, page 6, of Colonel Yolland's Report on Metropolitan Railways. As their Lordships had doubtless read that Report, which recommended that all these schemes for railways through the metropolis should be postponed for further consideration, he would simply move that the Order of the Day for the second reading of this Bill be postponed. He had the authority of all their Lordships who had spoken on this subject, as well as of Colonel Yolland, to whom it had been specifically referred, in favour of the course he now proposed.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that Colonel Yolland was in favour of the postponement of the greater part of these schemes to another year. There was, however, a portion of the line to be authorized by this particular Bill—that portion which related to the North London line—which he believed might be proceeded with in the present Session. Before, however, their Lordships determined to postpone this Bill, it might be desirable to appoint a Select Committee of their Lordships to consider whether it was desirable that any of these Bills should be proceeded with, or whether all of them should be rejected for the present Session. The Committee might go further, and consider how the question of metropolitan railways should be dealt with in future.

EARL GREY said, he did not agree with the noble Earl (Earl Granville) that the subject could be effectually dealt with by a Select Committee. Colonel Yolland, in his Report, referred to the Report of the Royal Commission of 1846, which investigated the various projects for establishing railway termini in the metropolis. The Royal Commission stated, that if at any time it should be deemed advisable to admit railways into the metropolis within certain limits north of the Thames, it should be done in conformity with some uniform plan, and that under no circumstances should the thoroughfares of the metropolis be surrendered to separate schemes brought forward at different times and without reference to each other. He regretted that this recommendation had been so little attended to. Fortunately, however, the evil had not yet gone very far, and he thought there was still time, if their Lordships acted firmly, to arrest its further progress. The inconvenience and mischief of allowing the metropolis to be carved out by public companies, who were subject only to such a check as could be put upon them by a Select Committee of either House of Parliament at the time when those companies applied for Parliamentary powers, were such that he was sure, if they continued to pursue such a course, they would in the end arrive at an inconvenient result. In his opinion, there was no scheme whatever, however apparently unobjectionable it might be, which Parliament could safely consent to, until the Legislature had determined upon some general plan of railway communication within the metropolis; and if they sanctioned the lines at present asked for, it might happen that in future years, when they were called on to discuss some general scheme, they would find that they were prevented by these very works from adopting a general system. What they really wanted was, that a plan of railway communication throughout the metropolis should be duly considered by the Government, and a general scheme adopted, which should have no reference whatever to any scheme brought forward by existing railway companies merely for the sake of advancing their own interests. In his view such a scheme should be proposed by an impartial body, who would look at the whole subject. Was it possible that a Committee of their Lordships would satisfactorily deal with such a question? There could be no doubt whatever that the drawing up of a general scheme of railway communication was a work which required a large amount of scientific knowledge and experience; certainly an amount which none of their Lordships could pretend to possess. For his own part, he should feel utterly helpless in the matter, and should not venture to express an opinion as to what would be the best course to pursue. There was another question, and a serious one—that was, whether any railways within the metropolis should be the property of any private company at all? Probably the right course would be to declare that whatever railways were admitted into London should be the property of some public body, like the Metropolitan Board of Works. In that case the working of those railways might be let to some of the existing companies in the manner most convenient to the public. It would be extremely inconvenient, and even dangerous, to create private property in railways within the metropolis. He thought the Government ought to take the responsibility upon themselves, and propose to Parliament the creation of some Commission authorized to take evidence and hear all parties, and then recommend to Parliament a measure which might hereafter be adopted on the advice of Her Majesty's Government. That, in his opinion, would be the best course to take with reference to this extremely important question. He did not think that in the face of Colonel Yolland's Report they ought to consent to the passing of any one of the metropolitan railway schemes brought before them this Session; and with reference to the particular Bill which his noble Friend had moved should be read a second time this day six months, there were so many insurmountable objections to it that they could not be wrong in postponing it—leaving the question afterwards to be decided what other course should be ultimately adopted.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that the plan suggested by the noble Earl (Earl Grey) did not meet the present difficulty. A Royal Commission had already reported on this subject; and they had had Royal Commissions on similar subjects before; and they all knew how jealous Parliament had shown itself of these Commissions. As soon as a plan came before the Legislature, which was founded on the Report of a Commission, it was usually overruled by a Committee of that or the other House of Parliament. It was stated by Colonel Yolland that the recommendations of the former Commission had been set aside; and yet the noble Earl proposed another Commission, and declared, moreover, that the Government ought to take up the whole question of metropolitan railway communication, and settle it by the report of persons appointed by the Government, and probably presided over by some Member of the Government. Such a body would labour, on entering into the consideration of such an important subject, under far greater disadvantage than a

Earl Grey

Committee of their Lordships' House. According to the noble Earl, the Government were not to make the railways; but the Government were to settle where the railways were to be made, and then the Government must make them. The meaning of that was, that the Government were to lay down a scheme for metropolitan railways, and then to come to Parliament for a grant of money to enable them to make these railways, or else to hand them over to the Metropolitan Board of Works to make them. Now, their Lordships knew something of the Board of Works. They were already engaged in a work of great magnitude—the construction of the main sewerage of the metropolis; and if they now attempted to carry out in addition a metropolitan system of railways, the public would have to wait a very long time before any of these metropolitan railways were brought into operation. If a Committee of their Lordships were to have the different companies before them, and to hear them with regard to the merits of their respective proposals, they would be able to point out to the House those which were decidedly objectionable, and those, on the other hand, to which they thought powers might be granted. It would do no good merely to throw out the various Bills this Session, because they would be re-introduced next year, when their Lordships would practically be in very much the same position. A Royal Commission could not settle the question. It was all very well for them to say "such and such lines ought to be made." The companies would very naturally say, "Then you must make them." The companies would only make those which accorded with their own interests. If a Royal Commission were appointed to determine upon the construction of various lines, it would be necessary for Parliament to go a step further and to find the money requisite for that purpose. He thought that the best plan would be to appoint a Committee and lay before them the plans proposed, letting them hear the evidence brought forward by the companies.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that before saying anything with regard to the general question, he would call the attention of their Lordships to the fact that the question immediately under discussion was, what should be done with this particular Bill for the Extension of the Great Eastern Railway. It was five or six weeks since this Motion came first before the House, and he then took the liberty of stating to their Lordships the strong objections he entertained to the proposals contained in the Bill, which he thought sufficient to justify at that time its rejection. But then it was stated, not without reason, that their Lordships would only have an opportunity of hearing objections, and therefore it was only reasonable that time should be given for the companies to establish their case and refute his objections. For that purpose an adjournment was agreed upon, and a subsequent adjournment had since taken place; but during this whole five or six weeks, notwithstanding the question had been two or three times under discussion, not a single answer had been given to any of the arguments he then advanced. Not one of their Lordships had stood up to defend the line; and on the last occasion it was determined to lay the matter before the Board of Trade, for the purpose of its taking into consideration this line amongst others. Their Report was now before the House, and it virtually substantiated every one of the objections that he had urged. It stated distinctly that the main objection—independently of the grave objections that the line, in the greater part of its course, would run parallel to a line already sanctioned, and that it would occupy a very valuable open space in the City (an objection in itself almost sufficient to condemn the Bill)—was that in carrying out the plan proposed by the Bill they would absolutely put an insuperable obstacle to the construction of connecting lines of railway, by which the metropolis could be traversed from east to west and from north to south; and that inasmuch as there would be a difference in its level and that of the Metropolitan Railway of between thirty and forty feet, there would be an impossibility in adjusting the level of the various metropolitan lines. It was quite impossible that such a Bill could be sanctioned. Independently of any inquiry which might take place upon the general question, the discussions which had taken place in their Lordships' House, and the Report of the Board of Trade, put the Great Eastern line so completely out of court, that he should be surprised if the Motion for reading the Bill a second time that day six months were not adopted by their Lordships. The noble Duke who had just sat down (the Duke of Somerset) objected to the appointment of a Royal Commission to consider the general subject, because he said it could not decide the question; but between the former Royal Commission and any which might now be issued there was a substantial difference. The Commission of 1846 recommended that no lines should be allowed to approach within certain limits of the metropolis. That recommendation subsequent experience had shown to be one that it was not desirable to carry out; and that the relief of the streets and a variety of other considerations rendered it desirable, if it could be effected, that there should be a junction of all the railways, so as to establish a through traffic, without the necessity of changing carriages. The present Commission would not have to lay down any principle, the principle having been already established that it was expedient that a through communication should take place through the metropolis. It would start with the object of seeing whether all or any of the schemes now submitted, or any substitute for them, could achieve this great object, without entailing serious injury upon the metropolis. Functions such as these seemed to him peculiarly applicable to a Commission, and peculiarly inapplicable to a Parliamentary Committee. It would be quite impossible for their Lordships, with the information they were likely to obtain in the course of the present Session, to investigate the subject thoroughly, and to lay down general rules for the guidance of railways, as well as of their Lordships' House. Some of the Bills, moreover, it must not be forgotten, were not before them at all, but at that moment were in the other House of Parliament. The noble Duke contended, that if all the Bills were thrown out, and nothing done in the mean time, they would be introduced next Session, and their Lordships would find themselves in exactly the same position. Undoubtedly, such would be the case. But no human being proposed to adopt that course. The reasonable and sensible proposal of his noble Friend on the cross benches (Earl Grey) was to reject, for this Session, the lines proposing to traverse the metropolis—and the noble Duke had almost admitted that the great bulk of them must be rejected—and to establish a Committee of scientific men, who would sit during the Session, and during the Parliamentary recess, and would be enabled to lay before them at the next meeting of Parliament a general systematic scheme of railway communication for the metropolis. The noble Duke said, that if Parliament indicated the lines, it was bound to find the means of carrying them out, or at least to be responsible for their formation. He dissented from that position. It was not at all necessary, that because a Government Commission indicated the line of a certain railway, Parliament must provide the means for carrying it out. The noble Duke was familiar with the continental system, which seemed peculiarly applicable to the circumstances of the metropolis. That system consisted in pointing out the lines which ought to be made, and offering to the various companies interested in the district who were willing to undertake the service certain concessions for so doing; the works were then executed upon the sole responsibility of those engaging in the enterprise. If a general plan of railway intercommunication were sanctioned for the metropolis, he did not believe there would be any difficulty in inducing existing or other companies to carry out the proposals. He believed they would find railway proprietors only too ready and happy to assist in promoting the views of Parliament. For these reasons, he did not think the course recommended by his noble Friend (Earl Grey)—the appointment of a Committee of that House—a desirable one. With regard to the Bill promoted by the Great Eastern Railway Company, he had not the slightest hesitation in saying that it ought not to pass. The fundamental objections to it were so great that it would be a waste of time and money to refer it to a Select Committee. The wisest, and to the promoters the kindest plan would be without further trouble, delay, or expense to reject it for the present Session, allowing it, if its details were susceptible of the requisite modifications, to form part of the general plan hereafter.

LORD EBURY agreed with the noble Earl opposite that the Bill ought not to pass this Session, and that the kindest course to the promoters would be to reject it at once. In fact, there was scarcely one of the proposed measures which ought to be adopted this year. It would be of great advantage that there should be some supervision over the construction of railways in the metropolis. There were serious and conclusive objections to the appointment of a Commission, but he thought that some good might be done by a Committee of that House to inquire into the different Bills that were now before the House—not into each particular Bill, nor to consider all the lines which were mentioned in Colonel Yolland's Report. It would be for them merely to consider whether there were among them any lines that might be permitted to go on this Session, such as the Midland line for instance; and then next year for the whole subject to be again reported upon by the Board of Trade.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, there was no Motion for a Committee and he thought it desirable that their Lordships should confine their attention to the subject before them. If the plan suggested by the noble Lord who had just sat down were carried out, the Committee would have to inquire into the merits of every Bill in the whole group.

EARL GRANVILLE congratulated their Lordships upon the valuable Report which they had obtained from the Board of Trade upon this subject. He should have been glad to have heard arguments in support of this Bill; but as none had been adduced, he should be prepared to support the Amendment. It would, in his opinion, be desirable to appoint a Committee to consider in what manner all these metropolitan lines should be carried out. Committees of the Houses of Parliament had great power over private Bills, and it was impossible that any public Department should undertake the superintendence of the construction of these railways. A great deal would depend upon the goodwill of the different companies running into the metropolis; and, upon the whole, he was disposed to think that the matter could be better dealt with by a Committee than in any other way. All the metropolitan railway Bills were now before their Lordships' House, and the course which he proposed to take with reference to them was this:—He should not oppose the rejection of this Bill, and unless strong reason was shown to the contrary, he should, immediately after the recess, move the appointment of a Committee to consider the whole question as to how these metropolitan railways should be dealt with.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that in many instances the Reports of Commissions and Committees had produced no results.

LORD CHELMSFORD wanted to know whether the noble Earl proposed that all the Bills mentioned in Colonel Yolland's Report should be subject to the scrutiny of a Select Committee—because it appeared to him that in that way injustice might be done to some of the measures which it was desirable should be passed this Session.

On Question, that ("now") stand part of the Motion, Resolved in the Negative; and Bill to be read 2^a on this Day Six Months.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS REGISTRATION (IRELAND) BILL—(No. 57.)—REPORT.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

On Motion that the Report be agreed to, Clause 30 (Registrar to learn and register Births and Deaths).

THE EARL OF BANDON proposed an Amendment—

"Provided always that all Births and Deaths which shall happen within the Workhouse shall be registered by the Superintendent Registrar."

THE EARL OF ST. GERMAN said, the matter had been fully discussed in the House of Commons, and he hoped that the Amendment would not be pressed now.

After a few words from The Earl of LEITRIM,

THE EARL OF BANDON appealed to the Government to postpone the Report, in order that he might have the opportunity of submitting his Amendment to the House at a time when it could be fully discussed.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that the discussion seemed to take the House somewhat by surprise; and he therefore suggested that the proposed Amendment should be moved on the third reading.

THE EARL OF BANDON said, he would adopt the suggestion.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Report agreed to; and Bill to be read 3^a To-morrow.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS BILL.

(No. 47.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that on the occasion of the second reading his noble Friend (Lord Redesdale) had objected that the interests of minors were not sufficiently protected under the present Bill. He (Lord Stanley) found that the provisions in the Bill and those in the old Savings Banks Act, in respect of the transfer of the deposits of minors were precisely the same.

LORD REDESDALE desired to draw the attention of their Lordships to these provisions. At present, the managers of the old savings banks exercised a discretion as to the employment of the money of minors; but under this Bill, on the application in writing of the parent or guardian, if the minor was under seven years of age, or of that of the minor himself if above that age, the deposit of such minor at a savings bank might be transferred to a Post Office savings bank; and the money might be withdrawn at the same age at which the minor might have withdrawn it at the old savings bank. Every one knew that a child of seven years could not exercise any sound judgment, and the parents or guardians in many instances were not proper persons to be intrusted with the money. The trustees and managers of the present savings banks generally knew who the depositors were, and ought to be able to exercise their discretion whether it was safe or right to allow the minor's money to be transferred. What he wished to propose was, that the transfer of money invested for the benefit of minors should be limited to those cases where the bank was about to be wound up, or where the trustees or managers saw reason to agree to the transfer. He wished also for some explanations with regard to the fourth clause, by which it was proposed that money invested in a 3 per cent stock should be converted into a 2½ per cent stock, the difference being converted into an annuity of the class which would terminate in twenty-two years. He regarded this clause as a confession that the expense of the Post Office savings banks had exceeded the estimate of their founders, and that they wanted a larger income to carry on the business. He pointed out that the part which would be converted into annuities would not be converted into fixed annuities for a certain number of years, but into annuities which became shorter and shorter every year, and therefore every year of less value.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that the whole object of the conversion clause was to give the Chancellor of the Exchequer the means of investing the monies of the Post Office savings banks to advantage, and that it would not affect the security of the depositors. With regard to the proposal of the noble Lord, in reference to the deposit of minors, it appeared to him that managers would be anxious to retain the money in their own banks, while the Post Office savings banks must afford better security to the depositors.

Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received To-morrow.

CHURCH PATRONAGE OF THE LORD CHANCELLOR.

AUGMENTATION OF BENEFICES BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, who had given Notice "to call the attention of the House to the Ecclesiastical Patronage vested in The Lord Chancellor, and to present a Bill on the subject," said: My Lords, I rise with some anxiety to call your Lordships' attention to a subject which is certainly one of importance, and which has been to me, for a long time, a matter of much care and consideration. Your Lordships are aware that great ecclesiastical patronage is vested in the Lord Chancellor. The antiquity of that right in the Lord Chancellor, as the Keeper of the Great Seal, makes it difficult to ascertain its origin. As early as the rolls of Parliament of Edward III. the right of the Lord Chancellor to present to all the Crown livings rated at twenty marks and under is acknowledged as being incontestably vested in that officer. Subsequently—probably about the time of Henry VIII., when the denomination of the coinage was changed—£20 was substituted for twenty marks; and by the courts of law, and on various other occasions, the right of the Lord Chancellor to control and dispense the patronage of all the Crown livings not exceeding £20 has been acknowledged to be uncontested. I make these few observations at the outset, because it is important to show that I am not going to take away any part of the property of the Crown; for if the language were courteous—which it would not be—the Crown might properly be described, in respect to these livings, as the trustee of the Lord Chancellor. With regard to the Crown livings, which by constitutional usage belong to the Premier for the time being, the Premier, when he presents, takes the pleasure of the Crown; but when the Lord Chancellor presents, he presents, as a right, without taking the pleasure of the Crown. The writ is couched in words carefully selected for the purpose of acknowledging that right, for it contains these words:—"Which presentation doth to the Lord Chancellor as of right fully belong." Such is the origin and nature of the Lord Chancellor's right of presentation to certain Crown livings. These livings are numerous, but the greater part of them are small and insignificant in value, and many of them lie in unfavourable districts. Being small and so situated, they have had the fate which constantly attends patronage of that description. There being no resident proprietor interested in the living, they have been greatly neglected; they present a most unfavourable contrast with other livings equally small in value, and they show by their condition—frequently in respect of the church, oftener of the parsonage, and also by the want of schools—the absence of any person interested in the welfare of the advowson. Moved, therefore, by these and other considerations, I have selected out of the number of the Lord Chancellor's livings 320 of the smallest; and the object of the measure which I seek to introduce is to give me power to sell the advowsons of these livings on certain definite terms stated, and to apply the proceeds of that sale to the augmentation of their value. Then, instead of those 320 livings being held in the barren hand of the Lord Chancellor, they will be vested, I trust, in 320 landed proprietors, each one of whom, living on the spot, will take an interest in the maintenance and welfare of the Established Church. What I particularly desire to do is to bring back the present state of things to that which originally existed—because advowsons originally came into being from great landed proprietors building and endowing churches; and then, by the sanction of the spiritual authority, he who had created and endowed was thought best entitled to have the presentation to the living. This is in accordance with the great constitutional principle that the Church should be united, as it were, with the landed property of the country. Your Lordships must be familiar with the contrast between a parish which has no resident landed proprietor and a parish which has a proprietor resident, who, having a right to nominate, takes a pride in the maintenance of the parish church, in its ornamentation, in the maintenance of the parsonage, and in the building and endowing of schools. There is just as much difference in the condition of such parishes as there is between an estate where the proprietor is resident and an estate where he is always an absentee. Those circumstances have led me to believe that the time has come when some measure of this kind should be initiated, and I have every confidence that such a measure will lead to an augmentation of the welfare of the Established Church. All men who have paid attention to the state of the universities, and observed plainly what is going on there, have been impressed with the conviction that the Church as a profession, in point of worldly advantage, does not offer adequate inducements for young men to enter it. I have long been of that opinion. I have been very anxious on the subject, particularly when I looked into history and observed the changes effected at the Reformation and the manner in which some of them have failed. The Roman Catholic Church had the advantage of a large number of cathedral, conventual, and monastic establishments. In these it gathered round it a large number of boys of all denominations and descriptions, who assisted in the services of the establishment and the Church; and from the most promising of these, after being carefully trained, the clergy were selected for the service of the Church. Our great reformer, Edward VI., observing this, endeavoured to provide for it by the establishment of grammar schools throughout the country. These grammar schools were almost always connected with some collegiate establishment in the universities; and the desire was that the grammar school should be a sort of seminary for the college, and that boys should be carefully trained there to be sent to college afterwards, and there be trained for the Church. Unfortunately, from the insufficiency of the endowments, and the inefficiency of the means employed, that plan has in a great measure failed; and hence it is, that unless we increase the number and value of its endowments, the Church at the present time, in the matter of worldly inducements, is in a state of entire inferiority when contrasted with other professions. It is in the case of 320 of these livings only that I have ventured to propose any change. I am perfectly well aware—and I desire particularly to attract attention to it—that, however promising this scheme may seem when stated in the abstract, the real practical utility of it depends entirely on the wisdom and prudence shown in the due selection of the details for carrying it into effect. If your Lordships will bear with me a few moments, I will endeavour to explain the nature of the scheme which I have embodied in this Bill, rather as a matter of consideration than with any kind of notion that what I have here written down is to be the plan which in all things is to be carried into effect. If your Lordships approve the principle of the Bill, I shall entreat you to grant me that mode of proceeding in which, from my experience, I have the greatest confidence—a Select Committee of this House, to which I am sure all parties will be desirous to send Members who will treat this subject without the smallest political bias. In that Select Committee I shall submit the details of my Bill to your wisdom for discussion and consideration, trusting that your Lordships will find the best practical means for giving full effect to the measure. I shall now explain to your Lordships how I propose to fix the standard of value of advowsons. This is an extremely difficult part of the measure, and requires the greatest consideration. It is extremely difficult to lay down, with any amount of certainty, what is the standard market value of the thing that is sold. I am sure your Lordships will have found, from your own experience, that nothing is more unsound than the estimate of surveyors. If you employ two surveyors, the great probability is that you will have a very different estimate from each. In fixing the standard, I have taken the most approved table of value of advowsons, and from the amounts given in these tables I have deducted one-fourth, to allow for the practical difference which almost always exists between theoretical value and market price. By that deduction I arrive at something like an accurate expression of the market value; and I have then ventured to double that value, for the reason which I shall explain to the House. Your Lordships will be aware that the principle of my measure is, that the purchaser has nothing to pay to the party who sells. The purchase money is expended on the improvement of the subject of the purchase. But, further, I do not propose that he shall expend the whole of the purchase money instantan. I propose that he shall pay one-half instantan, either in a solid sum or by way of annuity. Let me suppose for a moment that the advowson is worth £100 a year, and that the incumbent is fifty years of age; according to the tables, taking the value of money at 6 per cent, the advowson would be worth 6 years' purchase. I have deducted one-fourth, and taken the money at 4 per cent, in order to estimate the allowance which should be made for the remuneration of the services of the incumbent; for when a man buys a living, he buys that for which he is to do duty. Therefore, in calculating the price which he should give for it, he must make a deduction for the value of his services. I allow for that deduction. I take the value of money at 4 per cent, and double what remains after the deduction of one-fourth from the theoretical value. Take a living of the value of £100 a year. At ten years' purchase the value of the purchase is £1,000. If the purchaser proposes to pay this in money, I propose that he shall begin by paying £500—one-half. With regard to the other £500, the purchaser is to give security for payment, when the living shall become vacant, of such a sum as shall be equal to the amount which the £500 would produce, if it were duly accumulated with compound interest at 4 per cent, between the time appointed for the completion of the purchase and the next avoidance of the living. Your Lordships will thus see, that though the purchaser pays his money, he parts with it to be laid out on the subject he has bought. I have ascertained that the propositions in my Bill would not be deemed unreasonable by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. I do not mean to represent that those Commissioners assent to the principle of my Bill. All I mean to say is, that what I have put in it with reference to the value of these advowsons is not so unreasonable as not to be likely to be entertained by them. Your Lordships are aware, that if any proprietor advance a sum not exceeding £1,000 for the augmentation of the value of a living, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have a rule by which they may grant an equal amount for the same object. I propose, that when the Lord Chancellor sells an advowson, he shall, to the extent of a limited number of livings in the year, hand to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners a portion of the purchase money. In the case of an advowson sold for £1,000, the moiety of £500 would be handed to them, and they would be required to add to that a sum of £500, making £1,000, which would create an annuity of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, charged on their common stock. The £500, the first moiety, would in this way produce an instant annuity of £35, which would go to the present augmentation of the living of £100 a year. When the living becomes vacant, the remaining £500, with the accumulated interest, may be applied in a similar manner, or may be applied to the purpose of tithe rent charges, debentures, or Government securities, the income to be applied to the augmentation of the income of the living. In this way I estimate that those small livings may ultimately be augmented to the amount of, in some cases, two-thirds, and in others one-half of their original value. I offer the purchaser another advantage—that instead of paying the first moiety of the purchase money at once he may grant a rent-charge of 5 per cent, to be secured upon freehold or copyhold property; and as to the other moiety which would be paid upon the next avoidance of the living, such a rent-charge as shall be equal to 5 per cent upon the principal sum with its accumulations at 4 per cent. The whole principle of the measure is, that the purchaser, either in the shape of money or an annuity, is to pay one-half the consideration of the advowson instant; the other one-half, with compound interest, not to be paid till he comes into the actual possession and exercise of his advowson. Your Lordships will see that my object is to give an immediate benefit, but a greater augmentation to the living when the advowson comes into the enjoyment of the purchaser. I cannot imagine a more beneficial manner of dealing with an advowson. I will give an instance. A gentleman has an estate in the country, but the advowson of the living does not belong to him; it belongs to the Lord Chancellor. It may be matter of importance to this gentleman to have the control of the presentation in his own hands; and he might be glad to give a sum of money to have that right. Under the present Bill the owner of the land would be enabled to become the purchaser of the advowson. I have inserted a proviso in the Bill to prevent a purchaser of one of these advowsons from being at liberty to sell it until at least after a period of five years from the time of purchase. It would be no satisfaction to me to strip the Lord Chancellor of this patronage if it were to fall into the hands of societies or bodies of persons formed for the purpose of inculcating and promoting particular opinions, and getting subscribers to become purchasers of the advowsons with a view to effect particular purposes. I have therefore put in a proviso that no person or body of persons shall purchase or cause to be purchased more than four of these advowsons. I trust and hope that these advowsons will get for the most part into the hands of landed proprietors, who will become desirous not only of being owners of them, but also of discharging their duty to the Church, by taking a particular interest in the welfare of the parish and of religion. There are many other provisions in the Bill which I hope will be thought good by your Lordships, but with the details of which I will not weary you at present. I have just indicated the details of the Bill; they may be very different from the details which shall be ultimately arrived at in Committee, but I believe your Lordships will find them so far well-considered and accurate as to serve to show that this great principle of converting these advowsons into a source of strength to the Established Church is a practical one, and I hope and trust that this measure may leave your Lordships' House in a shape well adapted to fulfil the expectations which may justly be entertained of it.

The Lord Chancellor

LORD CRANWORTH congratulated his noble and learned Friend upon the part which he had taken in framing so able and important a scheme. As for the details of the plan, of course it could not be expected that any noble Lord would express an opinion until time was given for further consideration. Having had the honour of holding the Great Seal, he felt bound to say that he thought the measure would be not only beneficial to the public, but extremely useful to whoever might, for the time being, be in the position of Lord Chancellor. These advowsons were now generally scrambled for, and experience showed that those who obtained them were not the fittest persons to hold them. He thought, however, his noble and learned Friend had greatly over-estimated the probable value of these small advowsons. For instance, a living of the nominal value of £100 would probably not be worth more than £40, as £60, or thereabouts, would have to be deducted for the services of a curate to administer the living.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he felt great satisfaction that the noble and learned Lord had turned his attention to this most important and interesting subject. This was not the time to enter into details, which he hoped would be carefully considered by the Select Committee to which it was proposed to refer the Bill, and which he hoped would include some Members of the right rev. Bench. The principle of the Bill, however, had his entire and cordial concurrence. Nothing could be more embarrassing to a person holding the Great Seal than the proper mode of presenting to those small livings; for no matter how zealous a man might be, if he had not independent means, it was no kindness to give him the presentation. No matter how poor a clergyman was, an idea always prevailed among the destitute of a parish that he must have sufficient means to assist them in their difficulties, and that he failed in his duty if he did not assist them. This Bill would, he trusted, be of the highest possible advantage, as it would transfer a patronage, which was most irksome, perplexing, and painful from the Lord Chancellor, to persons who must have an interest in the parishes to which it referred, and who would be able to do what was certainly not in the power of the present official patron with regard to schools, churches, and other matters.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he begged to state on the part of his right rev. Brethren, that they felt deeply grateful to the noble and learned Lord for having taken this matter in hand. The details of so important a subject must, of course, be reserved for the Select Committee, or for some future occasion in their Lordships' House. No person, who had sat on the Ecclesiastical Commission, could be ignorant of the fact that there were very many livings which did not deserve the name of livings—the labourers in these unremunerative parishes would now have a chance of being repaid for their toils. He would suggest, as the matter was one of great importance, that as little time as possible after Easter should be lost in proceeding with the measure and settling the details.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, that having some time since had the honour of proposing in the House of Commons a measure somewhat analogous to that of the noble and learned Lord, he could not but express his gratification that a Bill of this kind should have been introduced. The great object was to bring up the smaller livings to a higher amount. He would therefore suggest that the Lord Chancellor should sanction the sale of some of the larger and more valuable livings, and add the value to the smaller livings.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was much gratified by the kind expressions of concurrence from the noble Lords, and his right rev. Friends who had spoken on his proposition. He had, in his original statement, made an omission which he should be glad to supply. The greater number of the livings contained in the schedule—about three fourths—were under £200 a year. A small number ran up to £250 a year; and there was a provision in the Bill that those now under £200 should be augmented to £300 a year, and that any surplus should be carried over for the augmentation of smaller livings. That arrangement was subject, however, to a proviso. Power was taken for applying a portion of the surplus to the building and repairing of parsonage houses, provided the purchaser was ready to add a proportionate sum of money to the fund for that purpose. The very thing desired by the noble Duke was therefore, as far as possible, endeavoured to be attained by the Bill. His Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury was unable to be present in his place that night, but had wished to express his entire concurrence in the general objects of the Bill. He should ask their Lordships to read the Bill a second time to-morrow, in the hope that it might be referred to a Select Committee immediately after Easter. By so doing he trusted it might be sent down to the other House of Parliament in good time, so as to escape being lost in the "ruck" of Bills which usually took place towards the end of the Session.

Bill for the Augmentation of certain Benefices the Right of Presentation to which is vested in The Lord Chancellor—Was presented by The Lord Chancellor; read 1st; to be printed; and to be read 2^d To-morrow. (No. 59.)

LOAN FUND BOARD (IRELAND).

ADDRESS FOR A COMMISSION.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM moved—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the Propriety of the Loan Fund Board having ordered that the Cloone Loan Fund should be closed and the Funds confiscated, and to inquire into the State of those Funds, the Manner in which they have been employed, and how far the same can be appropriated to the Benefit of the Poor of that Locality."

EARL GRANVILLE considered it absolutely necessary that a prima facie case should be established against the Loan Commissioners before an inquiry was ordered into their conduct. There did not appear to be a shadow of ground for the accusations which had been levelled against them. The power of appeal existing, in case of the dissolution by them of any local loan fund, had not been exercised in the case of Cloone, to which the noble Earl referred. The dissolution complained of undoubtedly took place at a period of distress; but the inhabitants of the district did not suffer inconvenience, for a committee, consisting of the magistrates resident upon the spot, aided by the Protestant and Roman Catholic clergymen, had been intrusted with the administration of the funds. What was the action of the noble Earl? He was informed that having been written to by one of the clergymen, the noble Earl, in return, expressed a desire that the writer would never communicate with him on any subject whatever.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM: That is not correct.

EARL GRANVILLE could only state what he had been informed. The funds administered by the committee amounted to £1,200; and he was assured that the noble Earl actually advised some of his tenants not to repay the advances made to them.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM: That is not correct.

EARL GRANVILLE hoped the noble Earl would be good enough to express himself in Parliamentary language. From everybody, except the noble Earl, he had received the facts as he had just stated them to the House. He must say, that he had never heard a more idle accusation against a body so respectable as the Loan Fund Commissioners.

THE EARL OF LEITRIM did not deny that the Loan Commissioners were very respectable in name; but the members of that Commission rarely attended to their duties. The Board was a mere farce, the whole business being in the hands of one gentleman. As regarded the correspondence to which reference had been made, the fact was, that having applied for information at the outset, he received a letter stating that his interference was not required. Subsequently, when all the funds had been expended, one of the clergymen wrote to him, asking for additional contributions, which were to be expended in the very manner of which he had all along expressed disapproval. Not unnaturally he returned a refusal. Conceiving that there had been an improper use of public money, when applied to for advice by several of his neighbours, he advised them to resist payment of sums with which they were improperly charged. But he never recommended any man to withhold money that was legitimately due.

On Question, Resolved in the Negative.

The Lord Chancellor

INCLOSURE BILL.

Bill read 1^a, and to be printed. (No. 58).

MARINE MUTINY BILL.

Bill read 1^a, and to be read 2^a To-morrow :
(The Duke of Somerset.)

House adjourned at a quarter before Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, March 26, 1863.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—The Marquess of Hartington, for Lancaster County (Northern Division).

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—considered in Committee.

Report—on Public Petitions, Thirteenth Report.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Stock Certificates to Bearer [Bill 76].

Second Reading—Office of Secretary at War Abolition [Bill 72]; Oaths Relief in Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) [Bill 74]; Local Government Act (1858) Amendment [Bill 69].

Committee—Telegraphs [Bill 57]; Salmon Fisheries (Ireland) [Bill 1]. Debate (March 4) resumed—Bill considered, r. p.

Report—Telegraphs [Bill 75].

Third Reading—Corrupt Practices at Elections [Bill 68]; and passed.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL POSTAGE.

QUESTION.

MR. CAVE said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is intended to abandon the principle of an uniform rate of Postage to British Possessions Abroad, by doubling the charge upon letters to the British West India Colonies, while reducing that upon letters conveyed by the same line of packets to Foreign countries, even at a greater distance; and, if so, for what reason?

MR. PEEL said, in reply, that the principle of uniformity of postage had already been abandoned in the case of the postage of letters to Hong Kong and Singapore, which had been raised two years ago from 6d. to 1s. The present step had been taken because it was found that the smaller sum was insufficient to pay the expenses incurred, and because it was believed that the increase would not materially interfere with the correspondence between those countries. At the same time, letters sent by private ship were charged at the reduced rate of 3d. and 4d.; so that there were two modes—one for those to whom time, and the other for those to whom economy was an object. Letters for Mexico and Cuba, which were formerly charged 1s. 6d. and 2s. 6d., were now reduced to 1s., because the former rates were undoubtedly too high, and because it was an advantage to assimilate them with the rates to our own colonies.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished to ask whether it was proposed that instead of granting a subsidy to the West India Mails, the Steam Packet Company were to receive any proportion of the postage on the letters as compensation for conveying them? He wished further to know whether the contract with that Company had come to an end?

MR. PEEL said, the contract would continue until next year, and a subsidy would still be paid for the conveyance of the mails. Tenders had been advertised for, and they were now under consideration.

MR. CAVE said, he wished to know whether the Governments of Cuba or Mexico were to pay any portion of the subsidy for the conveyance of their mails.

MR. PEEL replied in the negative.

FEDERAL RECRUITING IN IRELAND.

QUESTION.

LORD HENRY THYNNE said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a statement that the Federal Government of America are recruiting largely in Ireland; whether that statement is true; and, if so, whether Her Majesty's Government propose to take any steps to prevent such recruiting?

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, in reply, that no reports had recently been received respecting the enlistment of recruits in Ireland for the Federal army. Indeed, although there had been rumours on the subject, there had been at no time any definite statements.

RAMSGATE HARBOUR.—QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD DERING said, he would beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade, When the Accounts for Ramsgate Harbour for the year 1862 will be presented to Parliament; and whether any, and if any what steps have been taken by the Government with a view to the revision of the Tariff of Dues now levied for Ramsgate Harbour.

Mr. MILNER GIBSON said, the accounts for 1862 were ready, and would be almost immediately laid on the table. No attempt had been made to revise the tariff, as there had not yet been sufficient experience with regard to its working.

POLITICAL DEMONSTRATIONS IN IRELAND.—QUESTIONS.

Mr. WHALLEY said, he regretted to find that a Question, of which he had given notice, was so worded as to give offence to certain persons. He wished to omit any words from that Question which were calculated to give offence. [Mr. SCULLY: Hear, hear!] He would therefore omit the word "disloyal" from his Question, and simply ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he has received any information on the subject of the "demonstrations at Dublin, Cork, and other places on the 10th instant;" and whether it is true that "at many of which, as Kilrush and Bellina, an effigy of the Prince of Wales was publicly burned; and whether any investigation is intended as to the nature and extent of the organization manifest in these proceedings"?

Mr. SCULLY: Mr. Speaker, I rise to order. In consequence of my notice to the hon. Member for Peterborough he has altered the wording of his Question. Since you, Sir, have occupied the chair of the House, you have laid down a rule that no discussion shall arise upon the putting or answering of a Question, and that no Question shall be so framed as to convey an offensive assertion which cannot be contradicted in this House. Now, the Question of the hon. Member for Peterborough contains no less than five or six offensive assertions which there are no means in this House of contradicting. The Question, however, has been somewhat modified from the notice on the paper, no doubt in consequence of an arrangement come to between the hon. Member for Peterborough and his excellent Friend the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland. [Cries of Order, order!] I am perfectly in order. I have myself risen to order, and having risen to order, I am not to be confined to mere limits. Here, upon the face of this paper, has been put forward by the hon. Member a statement most offensive to the Irish people. The hon. Member has, however, withdrawn the word "disloyal," which he had intended to fling broadcast against the Irish people. But although he has withdrawn that expression before he ventured to put his Question publicly, it remains upon the books of the House in its original and insulting form. The hon. Member has no right to use the notice paper as a means of advertising his unfounded assertions. He speaks of "Bellina" as a place in Ireland. I suppose he was thinking of Bellona. But whether he means Bellina or Bellona, or some other Roman name, I have never heard of any such place in Ireland. So much for the hon. Member's knowledge of that country. Then it is alleged that the Prince of Wales has been burnt in effigy, but that is a circumstance of which I was totally unaware until I read it on the paper of the House. Nor am I aware of anything like an organization of the kind alluded to by the hon. Member. I might as well talk of an organization amongst the starving people of Staleybridge as manifesting a disloyal spirit. I now ask you, Sir, whether such language should be allowed, and I shall, of course, bow to your decision.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. Gentleman point out what he considers to be out of order in the question of the hon. Member for Peterborough?

Mr. SCULLY: I do not think the paper of the House ought to be made use of for the purpose of charging the inhabitants of certain towns in Ireland with disloyal manifestations, and with the burning of the effigy of the Prince of Wales, particularly when there is no truth whatever in the assertion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule of the House is that in putting a Question no argument or opinion is to be offered and no new fact stated, except as far as they may be necessary to explain such Question. The good sense of that regulation must be evident to the House. No matter ought to be propounded as a Question in a form to raise discussion. In the present instance it is quite allowable for the hon. Member to state the facts which are necessary to elucidate his Question. Whether or not the assertions he has made are well founded it is quite beyond my province to determine. It would, of course, be improper, and out of order, for a Member to state as a fact anything which he cannot substantiate. If it is capable of being established as a fact that the effigy of the Prince of Wales has been publicly burnt, then, perhaps, no great difference of opinion would arise, as to the appropriateness of the epithet disloyal applied to such a transaction. The rule of the House is, as I have stated, that no matter of opinion or argument can be introduced in putting a Question.

Sir Edward Dering

MR. SCULLY: Before the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland rises to answer the Question, I have a question to put to him. [Cries of Order, order!] I am not out of order. I have written my Question out.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Member for Cork was out of order in interrupting the right hon. Baronet when about to answer the Question of the hon. Member for Peterborough.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, I wish first of all to say, with regard to the observations of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Scully), that in the Question which has been put there has been no concurrence between the hon. Member for Peterborough and myself. I never have done, and never will do, such a thing. The hon. Member certainly asked me the other night whether he could put a Question to me with reference to the recent proceedings in Ireland. I said that any hon. Member was at liberty to address to me any inquiry he chose, and that I was bound to answer to the best of my ability. I deny, however, that there was any arrangement whatever between the hon. Member and myself on the subject. As to the Question itself, it is a matter of public notoriety that disturbances occurred in Ireland about the 10th inst. But I am quite sure that no one can reasonably affirm that these demonstrations on the part of a few seditious persons, in two or three localities, are of any weight whatever as faithfully representing the public opinion of Ireland. There have been these demonstrations, but they were extremely partial, and I maintain it would be most unfair to allow them to outweigh the general feeling of loyalty and attachment to the Throne which prevails among the great bulk of the Irish people. With regard to the Question put to me—and I am bound to answer it—as to the burning in effigy of the Prince of Wales, I read in the papers that such a thing did occur; but I do not think too much importance must be attached to that means of displaying feeling, and I will give the reason why.

MR. WHITESIDE: In what paper was it stated?

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I understood that the effigy of the Prince of Wales was burnt in the towns of Kiltrush and Ballina. Why, in 1861 I saw it publicly announced in the newspapers that I was myself to be officially burnt in effigy in a town in the west of Ireland. I had never been in that town, and could have given it no offence; but I visited the place on two or three occasions afterwards, and experienced no inconvenience whatever from the warmth of that demonstration. The truth is that the feeling in Ireland is sound at the core; and I am bound to say I believe that in London or anywhere else in England a handful of seditious persons, if organised, might easily break the peace, or any half-dozen or dozen evil-disposed schoolboys interfere with a proposed illumination. But in 1861 I myself witnessed the enthusiasm with which the Sovereign was received when she visited Ireland, and I am satisfied now, in spite of the supposition of the hon. Member, that if the Prince of Wales went, accompanied by his bride, to visit that country, in the course of his progress through the United Kingdom, he would there receive as warm a welcome as could be accorded to any member of the Royal family in any part of the Empire.

MR. SCULLY said, he would then put the Question of which he had just given notice. Previously to doing so, he wished to apologize both to the right hon. Baronet and the hon. Member for Peterborough, for having imputed any concert between them as to the particular Question to be put and the answer to be given to it. He had made the imputation because he saw the right hon. Baronet rise after communicating with the hon. Member. The Question he wished to ask the Chief Secretary was, whether he regarded the so-called demonstrations in Dublin, Cork, and other places in Ireland, on the 10th inst, as indications of personal disloyalty towards Her Majesty the Queen or the Prince of Wales, or rather as manifestations of grave discontent in that part of the United Kingdom? He also wished to ask, whether any precautionary measures had been adopted by the authorities in those places to prevent the demonstrations; whether he thought the better classes in Dublin, Cork, and elsewhere, had taken any part in the organization of those demonstrations for the purposes imputed by the hon. Member for Peterborough; and, if so, in what manner? [Order!] Hon. Members, perhaps, thought his question too long. If they interfered any further with him, he was afraid he should be compelled to begin it again in order to preserve the whole thread of his inquiry. Well, he would ask further, whether the students of Trinity College, Dublin, had contributed in any way to the local riots of the 10th of March : whether there was such a place in Ireland as Bellina, so pointedly referred to by the hon. Gentleman ; and, lastly, he desired to learn whether it was a fact known to the Government that the effigy of the Prince of Wales had been publicly burnt in Kinsale, Bellina, or Bellona, or any other places in Ireland ?

SIR ROBERT PEEL : This Question is rather a long one, but I most distinctly deny that there was any collusion in respect to the Question put to me to-night by the hon. Member for Peterborough. As regards the students of Trinity College, Dublin, to whom part of the hon. Member for Cork's Question refers, I believe they did not participate in any riot on the 10th inst. Like other young men, they made some joyous demonstrations on, I think, the 9th ; but I have heard no report, and I do not believe it at all likely, that they made any riot on the 10th. As relates to Cork, I have seen the statement in the newspapers, and I have also the authority of a written report from the Mayor of that city, that an organized band of persons disturbed the peace there. Indeed, it is a matter of public notoriety. Their numbers were, however, very limited ; and no one believes that that demonstration of a few seditious persons in any way represented the public feeling of the people of Ireland.

MR. WHITESIDE : I wish to ask whether the Government have directed any investigation to be made into the conduct of any magistrate in any part of Ireland who may have failed to perform his duty, being at the time supplied with a military and police force to put down the rioters if rioters appeared ? Again, has any deposition been sent to the Castle, stating the fact of this burning in effigy ?

SIR ROBERT PEEL : Yes, there was a report from a sub-inspector with reference to the alleged burning in effigy in Kiltrush, and I have just seen a telegram stating that eight or ten persons have been summarily disposed of by being sent to prison.

MR. WHITESIDE : The right hon. Baronet has not answered precisely the Question which I put to him. My Question was whether, systematic riots being said to have taken place, and the magistrates being provided with police and military, any inquiry has been ordered into the manner in which these magistrates performed their duty ?

MR. SCULLY : And whether any inquiry has been ordered into the conduct of the Mayor of Cork ?

SIR ROBERT PEEL : I have not heard that there has been any neglect of duty on the part of any magistrate, the police, or the military.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

DIPLOMATIC SERVICE.

RESOLUTIONS.

MR. DODSON said, he rose to call attention to the charges for the diplomatic service and to make a Motion on the subject. The expenditure on the diplomatic service, as far as he could ascertain it, amounted altogether to £360,000, and about one-half of that sum was defrayed under Act of Parliament by a fixed annual charge on the Consolidated Fund. The other part of our diplomatic expenditure was provided for in the Estimates yearly voted by the House. The various items of which it was composed were scattered up and down the different volumes of Civil Service Estimates, some of them being avowedly for diplomatic expenses, while others were disguised and placed under headings where one would least expect to find them. With the fragmentary Estimates which were submitted to the House at different intervals, it was impossible for any hon. Member, when asked to go into Committee of Supply, to say what was the cost of the diplomatic service, how the money voted was expended, or what they got for it. And yet, if he could not answer these questions, how could he give an intelligent "Aye" or "No" in Committee. Even if the Estimates were produced in an intelligible form, they would still be of comparatively little use, because they provided for only one-half of the expenditure on the diplomatic service. He had endeavoured to ascertain how it was that they had got into that position. Before the year 1830 a portion of the diplomatic expenditure was defrayed from the Civil List, and the other part by the Votes of that House. In 1831 the Civil List was reformed. A Committee which sat upon the question felt the mischief of making the House of Commons vote one-half of the charges for a service, while the other half was withheld from its control, and accordingly recommended that the whole expense of that service should be thrown upon a single fund—namely, the Consolidated Fund. At the same time, a few specified extra expenses for subsidiary matters, were put in the Estimates. These extras were gradually increased by salaries, advances for houses, repairs, &c., until at length, in 1862, they had reverted to the original abuses of the year 1830. He also observed that several diplomatic officers figured in the Estimates as if they belonged to the consular service, while others, who ought to appear in the Estimates, were transferred to the Consolidated Fund. It seemed, indeed, as if the Foreign Secretary could withdraw from the control of the House all the appointments which might be thought questionable, submitting only those which could not fairly be impeached. Another point requiring explanation was, that diplomatic agents, who while on service were paid out of the Consolidated Fund, had been placed among the Consuls in receipt of pensions. The late Chargé d'Affaires at Venezuela, for example, had been pensioned out of the Votes of that House; while, on the other hand, there was a Consul pensioned out of the Consolidated Fund. In fact, the present system was full of anomalies and contradictions which were difficult to understand, and which placed that House in a very difficult position when they were called upon to vote the Estimates for the diplomatic or for the consular service. The Act of 1832 was intended to put a definite limit on the expenditure of the diplomatic service, whereas that limit had, in some cases, been openly transgressed and in others indirectly evaded. He asked the House, therefore, to affirm the Resolution which he had moved, and the effect of which would be to repeal the Act which charged the service upon the Consolidated Fund and to provide that Estimates for the whole of the diplomatic expenditure should be submitted to the House in a connected form, and the Votes for that service taken, as those for the army and navy were proposed, in one draught. The House often felt that its power on foreign questions was imperfect, and that it was only through the Crown that it could deal with foreign Governments. But the House had the legitimate remedy in its own hands, from the constitutional check it possessed in the power of the purse.

Mr. Scully

If the whole of the Estimates for the diplomatic service were annually voted, the House would strengthen its hold on that branch of the public service, tighten its rein over the Foreign Office, and exercise a more direct influence on questions of foreign policy. The diplomatic body would feel themselves to be more the servants of the public and less of the Foreign Office, while the Foreign Office itself would become more sensitive, and would more quickly respond to the wishes of the House. Their foreign policy being more under the control of the House would acquire a more national character, and the diplomatic body, deriving their power immediately from the support they obtained in that House, would gain in popularity at home and acquire additional weight and influence abroad.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, all sums required to defray the expenses of the Diplomatic Service ought to be annually voted by Parliament, and that Estimates of all such sums ought to be submitted in a form that will admit of their effectual supervision and control by this House,"

—instead thereof.

Mr. LAYARD said, that he must admit that much of what his hon. Friend had said was true. No doubt, the practice with regard to the voting of the expenses of the diplomatic service was different from that which prevailed in reference to other departments of the public service. But the system had hitherto worked well. His hon. Friend had expressed the same opinions last year, and he (Mr. Layard) then ventured to differ from him. He was prepared to oppose the Motion on two grounds:—First, he thought what his hon. Friend proposed would be objectionable on the score of economy; and secondly, on the score of the efficiency of the public service. What was the real state of the case? In 1825 no less a sum than £300,000 a year was assigned to the diplomatic service. In 1830 it was reduced to £230,000, but at that time the salaries of attachés were not, he believed, included in the Vote for the diplomatic service. After mature consideration, in 1832, it was proposed that a gross sum of £180,000 should be placed on the Civil List for the annual expense of the diplomatic service. That sum was to include not only the charges for the foreign missions, but also the retiring pensions to which Ministers and others in the diplomatic service were entitled. His hon. Friend had mixed up several things which were distinct. The nominal sum was only £180,000; but going through the different classes of Estimates his hon. Friend calculated the gross annual expenditure at not less than £360,000. But that embraced various parts of the public foreign service included in Classes 5 and 6 of the Estimates. There was a distinction between the consular and diplomatic service to which his hon. Friend had not adverted. The sum of £180,000 was made to meet the expense of the foreign missions alone and pensions. The only real exceptions were the diplomatic establishments in China and Japan, which had sprung up since the arrangement of 1832 was made, and for which separate Votes were taken. His hon. Friend had stated that in Class 6, among the superannuation grants, were included the pensions of diplomatic officers. That was not the case. Then his hon. Friend had referred to the cases of the Chargé d'Affaires at Venezuela, and other diplomatic agents in America. In the first place, some of the instances to which his hon. Friend had alluded probably referred to a period prior to the new arrangements made with regard to our missions in South America, where the consuls general had received diplomatic appointments: their salaries were now paid from the diplomatic list. It sometimes happened that when a consul general and diplomatic agent was absent on leave, the Consul of the place was charged for the time with the duties of consul general and diplomatic agent. Although he for the time being discharged diplomatic functions, yet as Consul his pension would come under the superannuation list as that of a consular officer. The arrangements as to South America were different from those as to other countries. In nearly all the States of South America they had not diplomatic agents, but consuls general, who had diplomatic powers. While the annual Votes for every branch of the public service had increased, in many instances, to the extent of one-third, during the last few years, the diplomatic service alone remained stationary; and the Foreign Office, by the exercise of strict economy, was able to hand back annually to the Treasury some £7,000 to £10,000; but if the diplomatic charges were annually submitted to the House, he would venture to say that the increase would be as great in them as in those for the other departments. Excellent reasons would be assigned by hon. Members for the increase of this and that diplomatic salary. The evidence before the Diplomatic Committee showed that the expense of living had increased nearly threefold in almost all the capitals in Europe, and he believed that with few exceptions every Minister and Ambassador abroad spent more than he received from this country. Members of the House would be constantly bringing forward special instances of grievance in this respect, and the House would, perhaps, not be disinclined to listen to them. Therefore, he was convinced, that if the House had annually an opportunity of discussing the amount of diplomatic salaries, the result would be a large increase of expenditure in that direction. Upon the question of efficiency he must say, that the last reason assigned by his hon. Friend for making the change he proposed was the very reason why he should be disposed to resist it. The hon. Gentleman said, that if these salaries were annually discussed in that House, the Ministers and Ambassadors of this country would become more dependent for their policy upon public opinion as expressed in the House, that they would look to this House instead of the Foreign Office. They had in the diplomatic service as able, as intelligent, and as independent a body of men as existed in any other branch of the public service of the country; but the proposed change would, he believed, be fatal to the efficiency of the diplomatic service. Formerly, when a change of Government took place, there was also a change of their representatives abroad; but that system had, to a great extent, disappeared, and consequently their diplomatic agents had become independent of any political parties, obeying simply the instructions of the Minister of the day. But if every year diplomatic salaries and missions were discussed in that House, and our representatives were made to depend for them upon their political opinions, they would look to Parliament rather than to the Secretary of State; they would become politicians instead of servants of the public, and the authority and responsibility of the Secretary of State would be lessened. In the cases of Japan and China the House had been asked to vote sums for diplomatic salaries in addition to the £180,000 which had been agreed upon; but those cases were peculiar, a large diplomatic and consular staff having to be created in both of those countries. The experience gained by those Votes, and by the Votes for the consular establishments, did not encourage the proposition to submit all diplomatic salaries to annual discussion; for instead of diminution in amount, appeals were being constantly made in that House for additional consuls to be appointed. While the consular Votes had increased year by year, the Foreign Office was limited to the expenditure of £180,000, and it was compelled to restrict its expenditure to that amount. There were some charges connected with the diplomatic service, such as for messengers and couriers, which were included in the Civil Service Estimates; but the £180,000 had only been intended to meet the pay and pensions of the diplomatic agents, and not to include such items as those referred to. He believed that the Resolution, if carried, would only result in an increase of expenditure, without in any way improving the efficiency of the service, and in very much damaging the efficiency of this branch of the public service. On these grounds, he hoped his hon. Friend would withdraw his Motion, or that the House would refuse to adopt it.

MR. GRANT-DUFF said, he thought that nothing would be gained to the cause of diplomatic reform if the proposal were carried; for he believed that if the expenditure on that service was annually discussed by the House, it would be increased every five years. The amount for diplomatic services was not large, and, upon the whole, was well administered. He was not well satisfied with the expenditure in Paris, but was bound to admit that a majority of the Committee which sat two years ago did not agree with him. He believed that such Motions as that under consideration did harm, by withdrawing the attention of Parliament from what really required amendment. An increase of efficiency, and not a decrease of expense, was really needed in the diplomatic service. That service was at present in a fair condition, having been improved by the last regulations of the Foreign Office; but still further improvement was required, and that House could best contribute to that end by constantly pressing upon the Government to uphold the standard of diplomatic merit, and to make the service one d'élite which no one should be allowed to enter who had not shown that he possessed superior abilities.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he was struck by the extraordinary statement of the hon. Under Secretary of State as well as by the extraordinary theory he had propounded. The hon. Gentleman said that the diplomatic expenditure had not increased for thirty years; but it was proved that, instead of £180,000, the expenditure upon that service was £360,000 a year. The hon. Gentleman also said, that if diplomatic and consular salaries were annually submitted to that House, the consequence would be a great increase of expenditure. But, if that theory was good for anything, it went to the extent that there was no use in submitting any Estimates at all to Parliament. As to the increased expense of living abroad, that point had been considered by the Committee, who, however, instead of recommending increase of salaries, advised that no salary should exceed £5,000 per annum. He believed that they had, particularly in Germany, more diplomatic establishments than were necessary. He remarked that whenever they withdrew their diplomatic agents from any place things went on very smoothly, and it would appear that they only tended very much to increase mischief. It might be said that they gained information at the small Courts in Germany; but so far from that information being useful they would be better without it.

MR. AYRTON said, that it was much to be regretted that such an important Motion had not been met by a responsible Minister of the Crown. It was trespassing too much upon the indulgence of the House to leave the subject to be dealt with by an Under Secretary of State. The hon. Under Secretary stated, that if diplomatic salaries were voted by that House, the persons who received them would become party men, who would agitate for the increase of salary instead of attending solely to the service of the country. Now, was that a proper reason to give to the House of Commons for refusing it the control over the diplomatic expenditure? All the permanent civil service was paid by Votes of the House, and in every Department of the State there were important officers whose salaries were paid in that way; but were they made party men in consequence? Another reason given by the hon. Under Secretary was, that if the salaries were submitted to the House of Commons, they would be raised by the importunity of Members, and that the public expenditure would thus be increased. Now, it appeared to him that that was a libel upon the character of the House. Would any Minister of the Crown venture to assign such reasons as these for opposing the Motion? At present the charge upon the Consolidated Fund was often supplemented by Votes of Supply; but it was impossible for the House to form any just judgment respecting this expenditure without having the whole of it before them. At all events, he submitted that in connection with each item in the Votes upon that subject there should be distinctly stated the amount which was charged upon the Consolidated Fund.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he must say that all his prejudices and prepossessions were in favour of such a Motion as that before the House, because it tended apparently, ostensibly, and even really, to extend the jurisdiction of the House with regard to the details of public expenditure. Nine years ago it was his lot to propose to the House the adoption of a measure which removed from the Consolidated Fund a very large number of charges, and placed them on the annual Votes. At that period it was the duty of the Government to consider each case by itself, and to determine whether each charge should be submitted annually to Parliament, or placed on the Consolidated Fund. After taking a comprehensive view of the whole question, at that time it was the opinion of the Government that the diplomatic charges, properly so called, ought to be retained upon the Consolidated Fund; and when he subsequently submitted a measure upon the subject, he was not aware that an opposite opinion was expressed in the House. It was to be borne in mind that the question was then considered not casually, upon a particular point raised at a particular moment, but after full notice, after public attention had been drawn to the subject, and a comprehensive view had been taken of it, with the assistance of the collateral light thrown upon it by the consideration of kindred matters. He did not say that that fact was decisive of the question, which must of course be settled, one way or the other, wholly by a regard to the public advantage. The existing system was not, he admitted, perfectly and absolutely consistent. The general intention of the Act, which charged £180,000 a year upon the Consolidated Fund for the payment of diplomatic salaries and pensions, was that all the higher classes of officers should be provided for from that source. That, however, was not so; and, on the other hand, some of the lower class of officers, as to whom he thought it unnecessary that they should be placed there, were so provided for. It was conceivable, that upon consideration of the subject some partial improvement might be effected in distributing these charges, but that was not the question with which the House was dealing. His hon. Friend laid it down broadly that "all sums required to defray the expenses of the diplomatic service ought to be annually voted by Parliament." Now, to that Motion there was, in his view, in the first place an objection of principle, and in the second place an objection of practice. It had been the just opinion of the Legislature that the highest diplomatic officers held a position which it was so important to maintain in the highest degree of independence that it should really be treated in a manner analogous to that of the Judges, and that their salaries should be placed beyond the reach of the smallest uncertainty. His hon. Friend the Under Secretary had, at the same time, expressed an opinion, which was entitled to much more weight than his own, that the change proposed would be injurious to the discipline of the Service. As Chancellor of the Exchequer, however, it was his particular duty to regard the question from a point of view connected with his own Department, and he was bound to say, that speaking simply in the interest of the Treasury, and setting aside all constitutional reasons, he deliberately preferred the arrangement as it stood to the arrangement as proposed. They had had a good deal of experience upon the subject, and there had been some difficulty as between the Treasury and the Foreign Office in arriving at one conclusion upon many of these points; but in all the cases where the Foreign Office had made requisitions upon the Treasury for an increased public charge, these demands had invariably been supported by reference to movements in that House, to demands made there, and to the Reports of Committees of that House. The Foreign Office itself had greatly reduced these demands, and upon further consideration between the two Departments a further reduction had been effected, so that in a simple practical point of view he gave his entire adhesion to the main proposition laid down by his hon. Friend the Under Secretary. He did not deny the jurisdiction of the House of Commons in these matters, if they thought fit to exercise it; but he hoped that, on the grounds he had stated, they would not accede to the Motion. As to the statement that there had been a great increase in the diplomatic charges, that must be an error, for he thought that there had been no increase at all corresponding with the increase in the charges for government generally. But an increase had taken place in the consular charges, which were subject to the Votes of the House, and must depend, to a great extent, upon the demands of the growing commerce of the country in various parts of the world. The difficulty in keeping down these charges did not arise from the extravagant wishes of the Foreign Office, but from the necessity of making head against the authority of a Report presented by a Committee of that House. He could not give his adhesion to the proposition laid down by his hon. Friend, and he trusted that the House would not accede to his Motion.

Mr. Ayrton

LORD HARRY VANE said, that from what he had seen as a Member of the Diplomatic Committee he had upon practical grounds arrived at the same conclusion as the right hon. Gentleman, and he did not think that any reduction of expenditure would follow if these Estimates were submitted annually to the House. He thought that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was right in the analogy which he had drawn between the position occupied by the Judges and the higher diplomatic servants. The calculation on which the sum charged to the Consolidated Fund for the diplomatic service was grounded, was made many years back by the noble Lord the present Prime Minister and adopted by the House. Augmentations for contingencies had since been made, but these were annually submitted to Parliament. On the ground of economy he should recommend the rejection of the proposition submitted to the House.

Mr. PEACOCKE said, he rose to express a hope that the Motion of the hon. Member for Sussex would not be adopted. He had, however, understood the Chancellor of the Exchequer to argue that Ambassadors were placed on the same footing as the Judges of the land. Nothing could be more false in fact or theory. It amounted to this, that the members of the diplomatic body were fixed servants of the Crown. The Government of Sir Robert Peel, and many other Governments, he believed, had on taking office changed those who occupied the higher positions in the diplomatic service, and much of the evidence taken by the Committee on the Diplomatic Service went to prove, that so far from it being desirable that Ambassadors and Consuls should remain fixed servants of the Crown, it was, on the contrary, extremely desirable that consular servants should be selected from those who had displayed efficiency in public life at home, because they commanded more respect than those who had passed their time in the diplomatic service. The hon. Member for Southwark had expressed apprehension, that if a Vote on this subject were brought annually before the House, the foreign policy of the country would be more under the control of that assembly. That constituted no good ground of objection, for it had been proved to the satisfaction of the Committee that it was very desirable that foreign ministers should become better acquainted with, and learn to appreciate more, the public opinion of the country as it found expression in Parliament. He opposed the Motion solely on the ground of economy—believing that the charge for the diplomatic service would increase year by year if the course recommended by the hon. Member was adopted.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the hon. Member who had just spoken had attributed words to him of which he had not made use. He likened the position of the higher members of the diplomatic body to that occupied by the Judges, not on the ground of their tenure of office, but on the ground of their independence.

Mr. KINNAIRD said, he would gladly support the Motion if he believed that economy would be secured by its adoption; but looking at the large increase that had taken place in the charges for the consular service, which, before they came under the control of the House, amounted to £96,000, but now exceeded £160,000, he did not think that such would be the case. That increase had been incurred at the desire of the merchants.

Mr. SCLATER-BOOTII said, that he should support the Motion. Whether the hon. Member for Sussex went to a division or not, he had done good service by his Motion. He had shown the necessity of a revision of the system under which the charges for the diplomatic service were regulated, and the sooner the Government took up the matter the better. It had been shown that the £180,000 charged to the Consolidated Fund was insufficient to cover the charges placed upon it. In addition to the increased expense occasioned by the embassy to China and to Japan, there was this year a new Vote for the payment of an attaché, and he feared that from year to year there would be an increase of such Votes. He did not offer any opinion as to whether a portion of the charge for the diplomatic service ought not to be borne by the Consolidated Fund, but he thought it desirable that the House should have the control of the great body of the expenditure.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided :—Ayes 136; Noes 65: Majority 71.

DISTINGUISHED SERVICE COLONELS— COLONEL DUDLEY CARLETON.

OBSERVATIONS.

Mr. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he rose to call attention to the case of a number of officers of the army whose claims had been reported upon favourably by a Committee of the War Office, and had also been admitted to be deserving of consideration by the authorities of that Department. He had mentioned the name of Colonel Dudley Carleton in his notice, but there were several other officers in a similar position. These officers were promoted to the rank of colonel for distinguished service in the field previous to the Warrant of October 6th, 1854, which was, no doubt, a salutary and necessary measure, but had occasioned much individual hardship. To such an amount of discontent did it give rise, that a Commission was appointed in 1858 to inquire into its operation. The principal recommendations of the Commission were embodied in the warrant of 1858, which remedied many of the grievances. A number of cases, including those of Colonel Dudley Carleton and some others, were, however, left undecided by the Commission, but were recommended to the favourable consideration of the War Office. There was some question whether these officers came within the scope of the memorandum which was published with the brevet of the 20th of June, 1854, and which declared that officers promoted under that brevet would receive their promotions subject to new regulations about to be promulgated by Royal warrant. The officers held that they were beyond the terms of that memorandum, as it applied simply to those officers who obtained promotion under the brevet and not to such as were subsequently promoted in regimental succession. The Committee of general officers who inquired into the matter in 1861 took an opposite view. The officers in question, however, rested their claims on another ground, and that was the favourable recommendation of the Commission of 1858, which was endorsed by the Committee of 1861. The Secretary of State for War also agreed in that recommendation, for Major General Lugard, on behalf of the War Office, on the 8th of November last, urged the Horse Guards to give effect to that paragraph in the Report. The recommendation of the War Office would, it might be thought, carry with it a certainty of being attended to; but it was not acted upon, because the Commander-in-Chief stated in a communication dated the 7th of February, 1863, that having considered the question, he was of opinion that the objections to the proposal were so great that he did not feel justified in agreeing to it. His Royal Highness did not give any reason, and it was a rather curious circumstance that in the beginning he was of a directly contrary opinion. At present, then, the matter stood thus :—It had always been acknowledged that Colonel Carleton and the other officers were injuriously affected by the Warrant of 1854, and a Committee, which differed upon other cases, had reported unanimously in favour of theirs. The Secretary of State for War had intimated his acquiescence in that Report, and, in fact, the only objectors were the authorities at the Horse Guards, who seemed to think they had a controlling voice in all matters connected with military affairs. But what he could not understand was, as he had already stated, that the authorities at the Horse Guards were originally favourable to the claim of Colonel Carleton and the other officers, and that it was the Secretary for War who opposed their promotion. The parties had changed sides, and now the Horse Guards were the only objectors. That, he submitted, was rather hard upon the gallant officers. Colonel Carleton served during the whole of the Crimean war without receiving any promotion whatever. In his regiment no less than sixteen out of thirty officers were killed, and it was to that he owed his high regimental position. He had received a colonelcy, but a large number of lieutenant colonels had stepped over his head in consequence of the Warrant of 1854, and he still felt himself under grievous disadvantages. It was on that account that he had wished his case to be brought under the notice of the House, and unless he received some satisfactory statement from the Secretary of State on that occasion, he should, in all probability, think it his duty to move for the appointment of a Select Committee after Easter.

Mr. Solater-Booth

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the class of officers to whom the hon. Gentleman had called attention was limited, consisting only of three; and one of them had obtained his promotion, and was now full colonel. The only effect of the change sought by his hon. Friend was, that he could hold a different position among the class of full colonels. His place in the Army List would not be the same as at present. There were two classes of officers who were affected by the Warrant of 1854. There was one class known as the colonels of distinguished service, who were tolerably numerous, whose case was the subject of the correspondence recently laid upon the table, and upon which notice of Motion had been given by the gallant Gentleman opposite (General Lindsay). Now, the case of these distinguished service colonels stood upon wholly different grounds from that of the three officers whose case had been brought before them. That case related to promotion in the Guards. It would be impossible to deny that the Warrant of 1854 injuriously affected certain individual officers in the Guards. Their case, however, was considered by a Commission in 1858, the Members being the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke of Newcastle, Lord Grey, Lord Panmure, Lord Rokeby, Mr. Sidney Herbert, Mr. Edward Ellice, Sir James Scarlett, Sir Fenwick Williams, Sir Frederic Smith, Sir Henry Storks, and General Eyre. A more competent Commission could not have been appointed, and, after careful inquiry, they did not recommend any alteration in the mode of promotion in the Guards introduced by the Warrant of 1854. The system had consequently been continued up to the present time. When such a rule had been acted upon and acquiesced in for a considerable number of years, even assuming it was not perfectly just in its operation, inflicting hardship on particular persons, it was extremely difficult for those intrusted with the administration of promotion by an ex post facto regulation to step in and alter it. The War Office, moved by the recommendation of the last Committee, brought the matter under the consideration of the Horse Guards; but the Commander-in-Chief, who was the proper head of the discipline and promotion of the army, having made a careful inquiry, and having heard the statements of the various officers who would be injuriously affected if the proposed alteration took place, came to the conclusion, that whatever evil there might be in the present state of things, it was less than that which the suggested remedy would entail. Nothing could be more certain than that when such variations were made one set of complainants was substituted for another, and the only effect of granting the application of Colonel Carleton and his brother officers would be to raise up a more numerous class of petitioners. Under these circumstances, while admitting that the Warrant of 1854 injuriously affected certain officers, he was not prepared to say, looking at what had taken place, and considering the extent of time over which the rule had been acted upon, that the decision of the Commander-in-Chief was not strictly just.

GENERAL LINDSAY said, he thought the case of these officers one of peculiar hardship. They were a body who were hit by the Warrant of 1854 more severely than any other class. It occurred in this way. That warrant was by a retrospective clause made applicable to the 20th of June, 1854. At that date these officers were senior captains at the head of their respective regiments, and in a fortnight or three weeks afterwards they were promoted to the rank of lieutenant colonels. If they had been majors, they would have had first to become lieutenant colonels before the warrant could affect them; but being the senior captains of their respective regiments they were affected at once; and no fewer than 200 lieutenant colonels had gone over their heads in the last nine or ten years. The question brought before the Commission which had been referred to was the general claim made by the senior officers of the Guards, on the part of the captains and lieutenant colonels, that they might not be so hardly dealt with as they had been by the Warrant of 1854. The Commissioners expressed the opinion that the case was one to be carefully watched by the Commander-in-Chief; and if the general claim was found to be such as had been represented to them by Lord Rokeby, it should be rectified with the consent of his Royal Highness and the Secretary for State by giving them special promotion. But the case of the particular class of officers now under discussion was not specially brought before the Commissionera. That special case was, that they had been promoted between the 20th of June and the 6th of October, 1854. Their claim could not perhaps be legally enforced as long as the warrant was held to have a retrospective operation; but if ever there was a case which should have been leniently and considerably dealt-with, it was the present. The Secretary of State had himself thought so, and had pointed out to the Commander-in-Chief that all the lieutenant colonels of the line promoted between those two dates had already been removed, either by retirement or promotion, these few officers alone being now left. While the Commissioners of 1854 recommended that all lieutenant colonels of the line should be promoted on three years' effective service, they also recommended that the existing captains and lieutenant colonels of the Guards should be promoted on completing six years' service, or just double the period for the line. He thought that term of six years might fairly have been extended to the officers promoted between the 20th of June and the 6th of October 1854, without the least injustice to any other class of officers. Their case was one eminently deserving of generous treatment, and he trusted that before the hon. Gentleman opposite had an opportunity of bringing it forward again, it would receive favourable consideration at the hands of the Secretary of State.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, it was impossible for any one to read the particulars without admitting that the case was one of as great hardship as could possibly be inflicted; and he really could not understand how it was that the Secretary of State for War could have altered his opinion in so short a time, because they had his letter in favour of the officers only four months ago. The Commissioners reported one way, and the Commander-in-Chief differed from them. An umpire was therefore wanted between them, and the right hon. Gentleman ought to be that umpire. They often heard of the privileges of the Guards being greater than those of the Line; but the papers relating to the case showed that the fact of Colonel Carleton belonging to the Guards had operated seriously to his prejudice. For an officer of distinguished service, who was looking forward to the higher rank of general, to have two hundred of his juniors placed over him was no light matter, and it would seem as if in this instance there was something more than met the eye. As one of the public, he thought injustice had been done to these three or four deserving officers, and he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would represent the circumstances again to the Horse Guards, so as to obviate the necessity for a special Committee of Inquiry.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he thought it very unwise to raise the questions about the privileges of the Guards. No doubt there were anomalies; but if officers in the Guards had other officers promoted over their heads, they should recollect that they had themselves enjoyed a great advantage over the Line.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he was sorry to differ from his hon. and gallant Friend, with whom he generally acted on military questions; but he did not think that the question had anything to do with the privileges of the Guards. He objected, as a general rule, to matters of discipline being brought under the consideration of the House. The case which had been submitted to the House was one of peculiar hardship, which might be easily rectified without injury to the service, or to the discipline of the army; and he thought that if the Commander-in-Chief were supported by the Secretary for War, and by the opinion of the House, justice would be done, and he trusted the matter would be taken into serious consideration.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £1,953,000, on account of certain Civil Services.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he objected to being called upon unexpectedly to vote so large a sum of money upon account before the whole of the Estimates were laid upon the table. He further objected to so doing when there were admitted to be considerable balances in hand. He wished for some explanation from the Secretary to the Treasury upon that point. In one class alone he understood there was no less a balance than £620,000; why should they vote more money than was absolutely wanted for any one branch?

General Lindsay

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he regarded Votes on account as injurious to a proper supervision of expenditure; but as the balances of various Votes were paid into the Exchequer, his objection was not so strong as it otherwise would have been.

MR. CHILDERS said, the Committee might really be congratulated on the Vote, because it was owing to the adoption of the principle recommended by the Committee on Public Accounts which had been presided over by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir Francis Baring)—namely, that of making the Estimates include not the sums required for the service of the year, but the sums that would actually become payable within the year. Under the old system, the balance of a Vote once taken was transferred from year to year till the whole was expended. That practice had been abolished, and the balances which remained in hand on the 31st of March were handed back to the Exchequer. With regard to the present Vote, it was taken on account of the Civil Service Estimates as a whole, not as instalment of each particular Vote. There would thus be no obstacle in the future discussion of the Estimates.

MR. PEEL said, the Vote on account was rendered necessary by the change that was made in the last Session in the manner of voting the Civil Service Estimates. The sums voted last year were for payments falling due in 1862-3; therefore any payment falling due after the 31st of March could not, with a due respect to the provisions of the Appropriation Act, be made out of the sums voted during the last year. As to this Vote on account being suddenly presented to the House, he would only observe that it had always been stated that the change of form in which these Estimates were now presented would necessarily require a Vote on account to be taken. He trusted the Committee would agree to the Vote, for otherwise the new plan would certainly fail.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he wished to know when the year began and ended? Were the payments for salaries due on March 31 made in 1862-3 or in 1863-4?

MR. PEEL said, that payments which became due at the end of the quarter would be paid on the following day, and would form part of the amount to be voted by the Committee for the coming year.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he thought it incomprehensible that the payments for the last quarter of one year should be made in the first quarter of the next year.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that a perfect system required, according to the idea of the hon. Gentleman, that all payments for the expiring year should be made while the clock was striking twelve on the night of the last day of the last quarter. Such a perfect system, however, was impossible, and the system pursued was to make all payments as speedily as possible after they became due. When payments became due upon the lapse of fixed periods, the payments could only be made when those terms had expired. In the case of the National Debt, the half-year did not terminate at the same time as the Government quarter. The difficulty, however, was more apparent than real, and was so incident to human affairs that he despaired of overcoming it.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that as a Member of the Select Committee he wished to thank the right hon. Gentleman for adopting their recommendations with respect to the public accounts. They appeared to work very satisfactorily.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £574,154, Customs Department.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY remarked that there was a slight increase in the Vote. From the remission of Customs duties which had taken place of late, one would have expected some reduction in the charges; but such was not the fact. In 1861-2 and in 1862-3 the Vote was identical with the present; but in the year 1861-2 the expenditure was £731,625 only, or £22,525 less than the Vote. For what was the £754,154 wanted, if £731,625 was sufficient that year? Probably, the right hon. Secretary to the Treasury could give some explanations on the point.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that a reduction of upwards of £82,000 in the Vote had been promised. Instead of that, he found there had been an increase.

MR. PEEL said, that if the hon. Gentleman would compare the amount of the Vote with that at which it stood some years ago, he would find that since the changes which had taken place in this Department a reduction in the Vote to a considerable extent had taken place. The principal reduction then made was in the number of examining officers; but the great increase of business which had since taken place had rendered a corresponding increase necessary in the Vote. It would also be observed that the salaries had a minimum and maximum amount. It was probable, that when the large official changes took place some years ago, many of the officers entered at the minimum salaries which had since been increasing, and thus the Vote had become enlarged in amount. A Committee upstairs was, however, making inquiries into the Government establishments in all the parts of the country. Of course, any recommendation which that Committee might make would be duly attended to, but at that moment it had not reported.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £1,351,771, Inland Revenue Department.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that under this head also, as compared with the actual expenditure of 1861-2, the present Estimate showed an increase of £57,569.

MR. PEEL said, there was a reduction, as compared with the Estimate of last year, amounting to £30,000. He could only account for the difference mentioned by the hon. Baronet by supposing that in 1861-2 there were some offices vacant or salaries not drawn.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, it was remarkable that these salaries always crept up and never crept down.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that they wanted to know not so much what past Estimates had been, as the actual expenditure in past years.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £2,098,920, Post Office Services, &c.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, the vast increase in this Department might well alarm the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and there was great danger of the whole Post Office revenue being swallowed up in charges. The revenue from that Department in round numbers amounted to £3,500,000, but the salaries and expenses exceeded £2,000,000. As compared with actual expenditure in 1861-2, the present Estimates showed an increase of £28,250, and there was a further sum of £75,000 for contingencies. He wished to know whether the Estimate included all the salaries and expenses of the Post Office! He was inclined to think that there were other charges, without mixing up the Packet Service with the matter. He trusted that his right hon. Friend would give them some clear information on the point.

Mr. Peel

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he did not understand why the sum asked for in the present year should be larger than the Vote of last year.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to ask what arrangement had been made for meeting the expense of the Post Office savings banks?

MR. PEEL said, that that expense did not fall within the Estimates. The increase mentioned by the hon. Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby) was to be accounted for by the continual additions made to the provincial establishments. An increase had also been made in the pay of sorters and letter carriers in the circulating department. The total increase in the Estimate over that of last year amounted to £14,233.

MR. AYRTON inquired whether he was to understand that all the expense connected with the Post Office savings banks was paid out of the interest derived from the money of the depositors, and was not brought into the present Estimate. He was not aware that any authority was given by the Act to the Government to do that.

MR. PEEL replied in the affirmative.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he desired to have it explained how it happened that such an immense sum as £75,000 was asked for on account of contingencies; and he also wanted to know whether the Treasury Department exercised any clear and precise control over the Post Office.

MR. PEEL said, that no addition was ever made to the establishment of the Post Office without the matter being brought under the notice of the Treasury. With regard to the sum required for contingencies, full information would be found in the Estimates.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to ask for an explanation of the item of £37,000 for official postage.

MR. PEEL replied, that provision was made in the Civil Service Estimates for payment to the Post Office for the conveyance of official letters. In this Estimate provision was made for the conveyance of the correspondence of the Post Office itself. The receipts and expenses of the Post Office were thus shown.

Vote agreed to ; as was also—

(5.) £515,796, Superannuations and Compensation Allowances, &c.

(6.) £56,986, to complete the sum for the Houses of Parliament.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to call attention to the amount of fees paid on the passing of private Bills. It was said that the various companies and other parties applying for private Acts paid more than was sufficient to meet the expenses of both Houses of Parliament. It seemed to him monstrous that Parliament should make a large profit through the exercise of its legislative privileges, by taxing the promoters of projects beneficial to the public. He thought it would be well if a debtor and creditor account were furnished of the income and expenditure of the Private Bill Office.

MR. PEEL said, that these fees were paid into the Exchequer, and appeared in the financial accounts. At this moment there was a Committee of the House sitting to inquire into the whole subject.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he could not but complain of the great inconvenience which was occasioned by the taking of Votes on account, especially when the Committee was, as in that instance, asked to consider the Votes themselves on the very same evening. He also called attention to the rate at which these Estimates had increased of late years. In 1842 their amount was only £2,900,000 ; in 1852 £3,800,000, and that year it was £7,850,000. In 1842 the amount of Class 2, which included all the expenses of the Executive of the country, was £730,000 ; in 1852 it was but a little more than £1,000,000 ; that year it was £1,473,000.

MR. PEEL reminded the hon. Gentleman that a great number of charges which were formerly paid out of the Consolidated Fund, or by fees, now appeared in these Estimates. That was a circumstance which ought not to be lost sight of in comparing the Estimates of different years.

Vote agreed to ; as were also the following :—

(7.) £38,730, to complete the sum for the Treasury.

(8.) £19,263, to complete the sum for the Home Office.

(9.) £56,325, to complete the sum for the Foreign Office.

(10.) £23,047, to complete the sum for the Colonial Office.

(11.) £14,637, to complete the sum for the Privy Council Office.

(12.) £47,181, to complete the sum for the Board of Trade, &c.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he desired to have some explanation of the amount expended upon what he might call the office of the clerk of the weather. A table of the weather was published in the papers every day, and it was accompanied by certain forecasts which, notwithstanding the wide range which they took, were scarcely ever fulfilled. Mr. Francis Moore used to take the safe side, giving through the greater part of the month the one statement, "wind and rain ;" but since the President of the Board of Trade had assumed his privileges the intimations had been more detailed, and varied nearly every day. The effect of these predictions, with regard to sailors and fishermen, was often very injurious, either by keeping them at home when they might go to sea, or by inducing them to go to sea when they might be overtaken by storms. Only two days before the great storm of the 19th of October last Admiral Fitzroy prophesied that the weather on that day would be moderate, and it was only on the following day that, finding the weather was changing, he sent out a telegram that gales might be expected. In what he called the "Weather Book" he published the latter prediction, but not the former one. He should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade himself consulted his clerk of the weather before he started upon a voyage in his yacht. In truth, the whole thing was a burlesque, for no man could foretell the weather in so variable a climate as that of England.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, the Estimate had not yet been presented, and he therefore could not tell his hon. Friend what was its precise amount. The Vote for the Meteorological Department had, he might add, been proposed originally for the purpose of enabling this to co-operate with other countries in the collection of facts with reference to the prevalence of particular winds in parts of the ocean, and the classification of those facts, in the hope that some rules might, by means of international communication on the subject, be established, and navigators thus guided on long voyages, and enabled, by ascertaining where certain winds might be found, to shorten their time at sea. The suggestion originated with the Royal Society. A system had since sprung up of deducing, from such facts as were obtained, forecasts of the weather, for the guidance of merchant seamen in determining whether they might or might not with safety leave port. Now, operations of that description had not been contemplated when the Vote had been originally proposed, and he had therefore called the attention of the Treasury to the growing increase in the Vote, and had suggested, that as the expenditure was diverted to other purposes than the collection and classification of facts, the proper departments should put themselves in communication with the Royal Society, and learn their opinion as to whether meteorological science had arrived at a state of such perfection as to admit of forecasts of the weather being made with tolerable accuracy. The matter was therefore still unsettled; but when the Government received the report of those scientific gentlemen whom they had asked to pronounce an opinion upon it, they would be in a better position to say whether it was expedient to continue to vote the public money for the purposes to which he was adverting. Under these circumstances, his hon. Friend would not, he hoped, object to the passing of the Vote in the present year.

MR. DILLWYN said, he was glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman that the Board of Trade had placed itself in communication with the Royal Society on the subject, inasmuch as he had very grave doubts whether the public money would be usefully expended for the object in question or not. Admiral Fitzroy's drums, as they were called, which were to be seen at some of the ports, instead of guiding, tended, in his opinion, very often to mislead the masters of vessels. Not long ago he had observed, to a friend, seeing that one of these drums was not up, that the weather was sure to be fair, but that night came on one of the worst storms we had experienced this year. On the occasion of the Prince of Wales's wedding, too, having gone down to Swansea, where there were some demonstrations to do honour to the event, it so happened that he found one of those drums was up.

Mr. Milner Gibson

Everybody, as a consequence, feared that a storm was at hand, but, instead, there were two or three days of very fine weather. Thus, on two occasions within his own knowledge, those signals were at fault.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that as the subject was under consideration he would not further oppose the Vote.

Vote agreed to; as were also the following Votes:—

(13.) £1,994, to complete the sum for the Privy Seal Office.

(14.) £6,741, to complete the sum for the Civil Service Commission.

(15.) £14,640, to complete the sum for the Paymaster General's Office.

(16.) £2,923, to complete the sum for the Department of the Comptroller General of the Exchequer.

(17.) £22,857, to complete the sum for the Office of Works and Public Buildings.

(18.) £19,839, to complete the sum for the Office of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues.

(19.) £15,235, to complete the sum for the Office of Public Records, &c.

(20.) £157,424, to complete the sum for Poor Law Commissions.

(21.) £37,901, to complete the sum for the Mint.

(22.) £19,610, to complete the sum for the Inspectors of Factories, &c.

(23.) £4,316, to complete the sum for the Exchequer and other Offices in Scotland.

(24.) £2,445, to complete the sum for the Household of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

(25.) £11,580, to complete the sum for the Offices of the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

(26.) £2,752, to complete the sum for the Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums, Ireland.

(27.) £16,314, to complete the sum for the Office of Public Works, Ireland.

(28.) £25,060, to complete the sum for the Commissioners of Audit.

(29.) £14,351, to complete the sum for the Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commission.

(30.) £10,090, to complete the sum for the Inclosure and Drainage Acts; Imperial Expenses.

(31.) £35,511, to complete the sum for the General Register Offices.

(32.) £10,982, to complete the sum for the National Debt Office.

(33.) £2,910, to complete the sum for the Public Works Loan and West India Islands Relief Commissions.

(34.) £5,111, to complete the sum for the Lunacy Commissions.

(35.) £1,223, General Superintendent of County Roads, South Wales.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that so rich a district as South Wales ought not to come upon the Consolidated Fund for so paltry an amount.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he believed that it was the only amount of public money which was granted to Wales.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, he wished to ask what funds had been used to pay money under the Vote since January, as there was no balance in the Exchequer.

MR. PEEL said, that no payments had been required, and none would be made until April.

Vote agreed to; as were also the following Votes:—

(36.) £2,374, Registrars of Friendly Societies.

(37.) £12,243, to complete the sum for the Charity Commission.

(38.) £4,495, to complete the sum for the office in London under the Local Government Act, &c.

(39.) £2,342, to complete the sum for collecting Agricultural and Emigration Statistics (Ireland).

(40.) £1,193, to complete the sum for the Landed Estates Record Offices.

(41.) £1,098, to complete the sum for Quarantine Expenses.

(42.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £24,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864, for Her Majesty's Foreign and other Secret Services.”

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, there had been no time to investigate these Estimates, and he should therefore move that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.”

MR. PEEL said, he had given notice that these Estimates would be taken to-night.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(43.) £244,139, to complete the sum for Printing and Stationery.

MR. W. WILLIAMS complained of the increase in the amount of this Vote.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to ask who was responsible for that Vote, the increase in which was almost incredible. Within the last twenty-seven years the country had spent pretty nearly £8,000,000 in printing and stationery. In 1835 the cost of these items was only £125,000; in 1853 it had risen to £216,000; and the next year it doubled, nor had it ever fallen materially from that time. In 1861 it was £416,000, and in 1862, £342,000. Every year an immense amount of stuff was laid before the House of Commons, which nobody ever read, and the House got credited with extravagant expenditure in printing. A great deal of the printing set down to the House was not fairly chargeable against it. Every Department which wanted to have something printed without swelling its own bill, managed somehow to get it put down to the House of Commons. The House appointed a Committee every year, which was composed of some of the ablest Members, to assist the Speaker on questions of printing. But did that Committee ever meet?

MR. PEEL said, that the Departments were under the control of the Controller of the Stationery Department, who acted under certain rules laid down by the Treasury. If he received any application from any Department which was inconsistent with these rules, he made a special application for instructions to the Treasury. The Vote was, in fact, not so large as it seemed to be, for £40,000 was paid into the Exchequer on account of the sale of printed papers, and £19,000, voted for the printing in the Patent Office, was repaid by the fees.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he had moved for a Return some time ago, which showed that the expenditure caused by the printing of papers for the House of Commons was comparatively very small. He hoped that hon. Members would not be deterred from moving for Returns by the plea of expense. Frequently most important and useful information could be obtained from the Government in no other way than by moving for a Return.

COLONEL SYKES asked, whether the printing for the Public Departments was done by contract?

MR. PEEL said, that the printing provided for by the Vote was of three kinds—printing for the Government, printing for Her Majesty (that is, printing Acts of Parliament and Proclamations), and printing for the House. The payment of the charges for such printing was arranged in different ways.

Vote agreed to ; as were also—

(44.) £90,025, to complete the sum for Postage of Letters on the Public Service.

(45.) £9,662, to complete the sum for the Treasury Chest.

(46.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £8,500, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864, for the Expedition to the Niger under the charge of Dr. Baikie."

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that he hoped the Government would not proceed further with the Estimates that night as the Committee had not sufficient information before them to enable them to discuss the Votes which they were asked to pass.

MR. DODSON said, that eighteen Votes had been passed over in consequence of the absence of the hon. Under Secretary for the Colonies, and the result was, that a branch of the Estimates was now taken up unexpectedly, which hon. Members, who were absent, did not anticipate would be proceeded with that night.

COLONEL SYKES said, that if the Estimates had been gone through in their proper order, the items under consideration would not have come on at that early hour, in the absence of hon. Members who, perhaps, desired to take a part in their consideration, and he should therefore move that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he had frequently heard objections to proceeding with Votes at a late hour, but to object to go on because it was too early—for that seemed to be the objection here—was a rather novel course. The Government were quite ready to discuss any points that might be raised by hon. Members.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that the noble Lord was not dealing fairly with them, because it had not been anticipated that a number of Votes would be passed over, and others taken that could not have been reached had the Votes been taken in order. He had also to complain, that in consequence of the Votes given on account when they went into Committee, the sums put from the Chair were not the same printed in the Estimates.

Mr. Peel

MR. DODSON said, he submitted that before they voted the sum for the diplomatic service, they ought to know what was the expenditure of the last year. He hoped they would postpone the Vote for that service until after Easter, and that the House in the mean time would be furnished with Returns showing them the cost of the diplomatic service for last year.

COLONEL SYKES said, the objection to proceed had not reference to the hour of the evening. The question was, were Members then prepared to go into those Votes? They were not prepared to go into them. He hoped the noble Lord would not press them to do so after such an expression of dissent from the Members of the House.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON replied, that full notice was given, and it was no argument to say that it could not have been expected that the earlier Votes could be disposed of so quickly and others come on. There were Votes that would be unopposed that might be taken.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he hoped the noble Lord would give them a pledge that the Votes for the diplomatic and consular service would not be taken that evening.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, it seemed that the object of the Government was to shuffle the Votes through without inquiry, because, of twenty-eight Votes, nineteen had been postponed to a future day. Such postponements involved confusion. He wanted the Government to give notice of the numbers of the Votes that would be taken, but they would not do that.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that the Government would not go on with the Votes for the Diplomatic Service, on which hon. Members required further information, that evening; but there were a number of other Votes which might be considered.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

The following Votes were then agreed to :—

(47.) £66,000, to complete the sum for Bounties on Slaves and Tonnaged Bounties, &c.

(48.) £6,950, to complete the sum for Mixed Commissions.

(49.) £116,462, to complete the sum for Superannuation and Retired Allowances.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wanted to know whether the Superannuation Account was not increasing.

MR. PEEL said, that as far as that year was concerned, there was a decrease in the total amount, although there had been some new superannuations on account of the abolition of the Bermuda convict establishment.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY asked whether there was not an increase in the dockyard establishment.

MR. PEEL said, he was not aware of any increase during the last two or three years.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, he wished to call attention to an omission which had occurred through some inadvertence to the Superannuation Act, in consequence of which great hardship resulted in officials who suffered personal injury while engaged in the public service. The old Act contained a provision whereby the Treasury were enabled, under special circumstances, to grant a suitable allowance to persons who were disabled, as one of the officials in the Portsmouth dockyard had been a short time since from the murderous attack of a convict. Under the present Act, however, if the official had not been in the service for a period of ten years, there was no power to make a provision for him. That was a matter which he thought required the consideration of the Government, and he trusted that the Treasury would find a way to rectify the defect.

MR. CHILDERS said, he wished to inquire what had been done in the case of the Bermuda convict officials.

MR. PEEL said, that those officials received the usual retiring allowances, with the addition of compensation for the abolition of their situations. Those who were eligible for re-employment forfeited their allowances if they declined to accept it.

MR. AYRTON said, he had often wondered whether the forfeiture of allowances on declining re-employment was ever enforced.

MR. PEEL said, it was somewhat difficult to exercise the power of re-employing superannuated officials. Lately, however, a number of Custom-house Officers, who had been superannuated, were again taken into employment.

Vote agreed to.

The following Votes were also agreed to:—

(50.) £744, for Toulonese and Corsican Emigrants, &c.

(51.) £325, for Refuge for the Destitute.

(52.) £1,966, to complete the sum for Polish Refugees and Distressed Spaniards.

MR. COX asked whether the Polish refugees had gone back to assist in the insurrection. Poland was now the proper place for them.

Vote agreed to; as were also the following Votes:—

(53.) £55,700, Merchant Seamen's Fund Pensions.

(54.) £10,400, to complete the sum for Relief of Distressed British Seamen Abroad.

(55.) £2,625, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Allowances formerly on Civil List, &c.

(56.) £1,451, to complete the sum for Public Infirmaries (Ireland).

(57.) £1,600, to complete the sum for the Westmoreland Lock Hospital.

(58.) £700, Rotunda Lying-in Hospital.

(59.) £200, Coombe Lying-in Hospital.

(60.) £4,600, to complete the sum for the House of Industry, Dublin.

(61.) £1,500, to complete the sum for the Cork Street Fever Hospital.

(62.) £600, Meath Hospital.

(63.) £100, St. Mark's Ophthalmic Hospital.

(64.) £1,300, Dr. Stevens' Hospital.

(65.) £245, Board of Superintendence of Dublin Hospitals.

(66.) £5,847, to complete the sum for the Concordatum Fund.

(67.) £25,278, Non-conforming, Seceding, and Protestant Dissenting Ministers in Ireland.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the charge was increasing, and ought to be diminished. He would take the sense of the Committee on proceeding with it in the absence of many hon. Members who took an interest in the subject.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That a sum, not exceeding £25,278, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864, for Non-conforming Seceding, and Protestant Dissenting Ministers in Ireland."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 53; Naves 26; Majority 27.

MR. HENLEY said, before the Chairman reported progress, he would beg leave to say that he thought that the mode in which the Votes had been taken that night was very inconvenient, and he trusted that it would not be drawn into a precedent. The notice on the paper of the Votes to be taken was, to say the least of it, very equivocal. It might be read different ways. It might have been supposed either that a Vote was to be taken on account for the several numbers mentioned, or even that the Votes were to be taken throughout upon each particular item, but no one would suppose that a Vote was to be taken on account early in the evening, and that the balance of the same Vote was to be taken at a later hour. Certainly if such a proceeding as that were intended, common candour required that full notice should be given, so that hon. Members might know what they were about. The Committee had actually agreed to balances in cases where the former Votes on account had not been reported, and where there was nothing to show to what they related. Such a hop-step-and-jump method of doing business precluded the possibility, he would not say of discussing the Votes in a proper manner, but even of understanding them. Many hon. Members were no doubt absent, thinking that the Votes would be taken in their regular order. But if that precedent were to be followed, they might as well all stay at home, for it was impossible that they could take part in the discussion for any useful purpose.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to thank the right hon. Gentleman for his well-timed observations, and to express a hope that they would have the desired effect. He had often known Votes passed in an improper manner, but he had never witnessed such a proceeding as that of that evening. Nearly a hundred different Votes had been agreed to, and yet he believed that not one hon. Member knew anything whatever about them, as they were put from the Chair. Such a mode of transacting business was not in conformity with the honour or duty of the House, and he joined with the right hon. Gentleman in hoping that it would not be made a precedent.

MR. PEEL explained that the Votes on account taken that night were not taken on the usual grounds on which Votes on account were asked for; but in consequence of a change which had been introduced during the last year in the mode of voting the Civil Service Estimates. Last Session those Estimates were voted on a principle which rendered it necessary that the Government should have the authority of the House for making certain payments falling due after the 1st of April next. It was by mere accident that the residue of the Votes was taken on the same evening. He had intended, indeed, to ask for Votes on account on the previous day, but the debate on the Irish Salmon Fisheries Bill occupied the whole of the sitting; and when he asked the House to go into Committee of Supply, his Motion was objected to, on the ground that it was then too late to proceed with it. He was consequently obliged to give notice for that night, because it was the last night on which Votes on account could be taken, if the Government were to have funds to meet the payments falling due at the beginning of the following month. With respect to taking the balance of the Votes on the same night, he could not tell at the beginning of the evening what progress the Committee would make, and therefore, in order to make sure of the sums required immediately, it was necessary that he should commence by taking a sum on account in respect of all the Votes.

MR. HENLEY said, that he had not objected to the taking of Votes on account, as he quite understood the necessity for that course under the arrangements of the last year. But when that course was adopted, the House generally understood that another opportunity for discussing and eliciting explanations relative to the particular Vote would be afforded. He never before recollected a Vote on account and what was called the balance being both taken on the same evening. Indeed, he could not tell how the Chairman arrived at the balance when the Vote on account had not been reported. He believed that the first Vote ought to have been reported to the House before the second was proceeded with, and that the two should be treated as distinct Votes. Was the Report to be brought up on the following day in a double shape? That was a matter of no trifling importance. The process that had been adopted, if not irregular, was certainly novel, and he thought it so unusual that he felt it his duty to enter his protest against it.

MR. DILLWYN said, he was glad that the right hon. Gentleman opposite had animadverted on that great irregularity which was creeping into their proceedings, and which, if continued, would put an end to the House's control over the Votes. He trusted that the same right hon. Gentleman would draw up a Resolution calculated to check so evil a practice. He supposed that the temptation to slip through the first and second halves of a Vote on the same evening was so great that the Government could not resist it.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, there could be no doubt that the course pursued that night had been unusual, because he believed that was the first, or nearly the first occasion on which the plan of taking Votes on account for the Civil Service Expenditure had been acted upon. But he could not admit that there was anything in it either dangerous, unconstitutional, or which limited the responsibility of the Government. What was it that his right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury had done? Why, he had first asked for a Vote on account, say, to defray the salaries of the Treasury, and that Vote was agreed to. Then, later in the evening, he had asked for a further sum to make up the amount required for the expenses of the Treasury for the year. The right hon. Gentleman opposite said that the House knew nothing of those Votes on account until they had been reported. But what the Committee had to be satisfied about was that the Government asked neither too much nor too little in the aggregate for the expenses of the Treasury for the year; and if it had assented to the two Votes, he could not see that the Committee had been wanting in its duty, or that the Government had been guilty of any breach of its responsibility to the House. He quite agreed that it was not desirable that this course should often be repeated. He admitted that it was unusual, and might even, perhaps, be inconvenient, but that it was liable to the very severe censure of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, or that in this instance it could lead to any dangerous consequences, he could not for a moment suppose. The two sums correctly made up the amount which the Government intended to ask for the services of the present year; and it was impossible for his right hon. Friend to know in the early part of the evening what progress the Committee might make with the Votes. What he had to do, in the first instance, was to secure a Vote on account to meet the payments falling due in April. The approval awarded by his hon. Friends near him to the observations of the right hon.

Member for Oxfordshire was therefore somewhat precipitate.

MR. HENLEY said, that he had never used the words "dangerous or unconstitutional." He had called the practice "novel," and believed it to be "irregular," and the right hon. Gentleman himself had just applied to it the further epithet of "inconvenient," which was quite correct. So far as he was concerned, he was content to leave the matter on that footing.

COLONEL SYKES said, that when a Vote on account was moved that evening, he had felt satisfied that no division would be taken, and that an opportunity for discussion would be afforded when the balance was asked for on some future occasion. Believing that the usual practice would be adhered to, he had left the House.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow;
Committee to sit again To-morrow.

TELEGRAPHS BILL—[Bill 57.] COMMITTEE.

(Progress 23rd March.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 13, 14, and 15 were agreed to.

Clause 16 (For Works under or over Land Consent of Owner, &c., requisite).

MR. BLACKBURN said, the clause provided that no company should place its works over or across any lands belonging to the Crown without the previous consent of the proprietor. He wished to propose a verbal Amendment, extending the same rule to lands belonging to private owners.

MR. MILNER GIBSON explained that the clause stated that generally the company should not place posts "on, over, or along" any land except with the consent of the owner, lessee, or occupier. It was only in the saving part of the clause that the power arose of crossing property other than Crown property without the consent of the owner; but it had reference only to wires carried over houses, and not within six feet of them, in which case the consent of the street authorities was to be held sufficient. The proposed alteration would operate as a serious impediment to the extension of town telegraphy.

MR. C. TURNER said, he wished to inquire how a man who lived in a two-story house, which he wished to raise to four stories, or who wished to build a mill on the spot, was to get rid of the wire.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, in the next clause there was a proviso which guarded the rights of the owner of the house in such a case.

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL said, there was no nuisance in having a wire passed six feet over a house. If the consent of every householder were to be obtained, the sixpenny telegraph system could never have been carried out in London.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he did not think the right hon. Gentleman was well acquainted with his own Bill. The proviso to which he had referred was contained in the 26th clause.

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to ask when the street authorities gave permission to have a telegraph erected, what was to prevent the wire being brought across a man's window?

MR. MILNER GIBSON replied that the meaning of the clause was that no wire was to be taken in and no post was to be erected within ten yards of the front of a house without the consent of the owner or the occupier. But a wire might be carried six feet above the elevation of the level of the roof without the written consent of the owner or occupier. If, however, the wording was obscure, it should be made clear.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he did not see why the same rule which applied to houses built upon Crown property should not also be applied to houses not so built.

MR. LOCKE said, he wished to ask whether, if a house of two stories were to be raised to six stories, the wire was to go through it or be raised.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, the wire would be raised.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 17 agreed to.

Clause 18 (For Telegraphs above Ground, and Posts, within certain Distance of Dwelling Houses, Consent of Occupier, &c., requisite).

MR. HENLEY inquired whether the rule which forbade that a wire should come within ten yards in front of a house of the value of £20, or within six feet of the roof, would apply to houses along turnpike roads.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, it would apply to all dwelling-houses.

MR. HENLEY said, he should move to strike out the words "of the annual value of £20 and upwards." He did not see why the humbler occupiers should not have the same protection against the wire and posts being placed in front of their houses without their consent as people living in dwellings of £20 and upwards.

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL said, a limit must be placed somewhere, and he thought £20 a fair one.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that the objection taken by the right hon. Member was prima facie a sound one. If, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman would consent to allow the matter to stand over, he would see whether they could not provide in some way the protection he desired.

MR. HENLEY said, the poor man ought not to have his doorway stopped up, any more than the rich man, by having a post put up to it.

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL denied that there was any practical nuisance in the case of the poor man.

MR. WALPOLE said, he wished to ask if there was no practical nuisance, why they exempted £20 houses?

Amendment agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 19 to 22, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 23 (Powers of Board of Trade respecting the Objection).

MR. BLACKBURN said, he would suggest the omission of the words "providing that compensation should be settled by the Board of Trade."

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, there would be no means of giving compensation at all if these words were omitted.

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL suggested that the omission of the words would force telegraph companies into courts of law, and the less they were found there the better.

Words retained.

Clause agreed to; as was also Clause 24.

Clause 25 (Costs).

MR. HENLEY said, he doubted whether the terms of the clause were large enough to enable the Board of Trade to settle costs in cases of arbitration.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he would put in words to carry out that object.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 26 (For Building or other Purposes, Owner, &c., may require Removal of Works though not originally objected to, but subject to Reference to Board of Trade).

Mr. C. Turner

MR. LOCKE said, he wished to call attention to the injustice which the adoption of the clause would work. He would put the case of a person having a piece of land on which he wished to build a house, or a house on which he wanted to place an additional story. He might be prevented from doing either of those things because a telegraph company had carried their wires six feet above his house or his land. The remedy proposed by the Bill was, that he should state his grievance to the Board of Trade, who would pronounce what in their opinion was a just decision. But that was contrary to all law. The noble Lord complained that telegraph companies would be driven into a court of law on every occasion, and so they ought to be. The common law said they should not place a wire across a man's house without his consent. Cujus est solum ejus est usque ad cælum was the maxim of the common law, but it was to be no longer observed. The Board of Trade were to have power to say a man should not build his house higher; but if it did give leave, the landowner was to pay the expense of applying for permission. That was preposterous. A man should be left to the exercise of his common law rights.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he also protested against the clause as interfering with the common law of the land. It was quite true that private Bills introduced into Parliament sought to do so also, but in the case of these compensation was provided. As the clause stood a man could not ride across his own land. It ought to be framed in such a manner as to leave him a right of action in case he suffered any injury from the wire running over the land.

MR. BUTT said, the two hon. and learned Gentlemen who had preceded him appeared to have misapprehended the effects of the clause. A previous clause required that the company should do as little damage as possible, and should make compensation for any damage inflicted. If the wires ran over a man's house so as to interfere with his raising his house, of course the owner would be entitled to compensation. The provisions of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act would also apply, and therefore this was a clause in relief of the landowner. It was only in cases where an Act of Parliament had been obtained authorizing the erection of the telegraph wires that the landowners would be put to the expense of applying to the Board of Trade.

MR. HENLEY said, he must admit that the clauses which had been agreed to gave telegraph companies power to go over a man's house, at a height of six feet, without compensation; but if he wanted to raise the house, why should he be obliged to go to the Board of Trade for permission? That was an abomination. No one had a right to place an impediment in the way of a man getting nearer to heaven, which was what they all wanted to do in some way or another.

MR. DILLWYN said, that no doubt the powers given by the Act were similar to the powers conferred by private Bills, but there was a difference between public and private Bills. In the case of a private Bill all parties had notice, and could make their complaints before a Select Committee, and then, as a last resort, they could fall back on the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act. He thought these were dangerous powers to confer.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he was at a loss to understand what amendment was required. The hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) seemed to think it was an advantage to compel a man to go to a court of law rather than to the Board of Trade. The clause was eminently protective of the rights of the owners of property, and it vindicated those rights in the cheapest and most summary manner. He therefore trusted that the Committee would pass the clause.

MR. HENLEY said, that in order to bring the matter to an issue he would move to omit all the words after the word "notice," in line 42, page 10, to the word "expedient," in line 19, page 11. The Bill gave the companies power to take their wires over any man's house and across any man's land. ["No, no!"] He maintained that it did. If the company got the consent of the public authority, having control over the street, they could carry their wires without leave and without compensation. If a man wished to build a house on the land over which the company's wires ran, he did not see why he was to wait for the consent of the Board of Trade to enable him to do so.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that he wished to know the effect of the proposed Amendment.

MR. HENLEY said, that the effect would be, that where a company had an easement over a house or land, on the owner giving them notice that he wanted to deal with his property, they must either remove or alter their wires, so as to give him an opportunity of making the alterations he required.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that a man might capriciously and wilfully give the company notice, and it would be most unreasonable that the company should not be heard.

MR. J. C. EWART said, he must agree that there ought to be some court to which both parties could appeal.

MR. ROLT said, that the Bill dealt with the rights of property in a manner entirely novel. ["No!"] Yes, it took away the rights of property without compensation, and that had never occurred before. The sixth clause of the Bill provided for compensation if damage were done to private property; but if the company, by the authority of the public body having charge of the road or street, carried their telegraph wires in the air six feet above the house or land, not doing any damage, then there was to be no compensation to the owner. The house over which the wires were carried might be a low one, and the owner might wish to raise it, but he must first sue to the Board of Trade for power to do so. Now, this was going too far. He thought it was a dangerous thing to allow interference with the rights of property at all without the consent of the owner, and without compensation; but if for objects of public utility such an interference were permitted, it should at least be guarded in every possible way, and the owner who contemplated an improvement in his property should not be forced to go to the Board of Trade in order to enjoy his rights. The Amendment of the right hon. Gentlemen was therefore quite necessary. The wires ought to be removed at a short notice on a simple assertion of the owner that he required to build.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, it might be quite right that the telegraph company should be forced to remove the wires, in order that the owner of the house or land might carry out any improvement; but having laid those wires lawfully and under the authority of Parliament, they ought, when required to remove them, to have the opportunity of stating any objections which might be raised against that removal. All the modern improvements—railways, canals, telegraphs—interfered with private rights, and he would not consent to leave the companies at the mercy of private caprice.

Mr. Henley

MR. AYRTON said, there could be no doubt as to the correctness of the construction which had been put upon the clause by his hon. and learned Friend. In the case of railways and canals the owners of property were paid for the land that was taken from them; but the telegraph wires were to be laid without compensation to the owner, and perhaps against his will and then, when he wished to execute improvements which interfered with the wire he was not to be allowed to do so, but the Board of Trade was to decide whether or not he was at liberty to use his own property. Still, the Amendment went a little too far, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Milner Gibson) would reconsider the clause.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he wished to point out that telegraph companies would have more power without the clause than with it, for the Bill interfered with such companies and not with owners of property. It was rather for the telegraph companies than for the householders to claim compensation. He should, however, be happy to consider any Amendment that the clause was capable of.

MR. HENLEY said; he thought that the Amendment which he had proposed would be sufficient to meet the object which he had in view. If a man desired to raise his house ten feet, it was clearly the duty of the telegraph companies, after receiving notice to that effect, to raise their wires ten feet to enable him to do so. There could be no doubt, that in the course of the last year or two, several Bills had slipped through Parliament conferring powers which ought never to have been granted. The clause, moreover, would not apply to any case where the landowner had given permission or received compensation.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he could not understand what the Board of Trade would have to decide, or on what principles they would decide. Suppose he wished to build his house four stories high; it might be a caprice, but he had a right to indulge that caprice. The question was, whether a man was permitted to build his house as the common law permitted him. Then, what had the Board of Trade to decide? Every man should be left to his common law right to do as he pleased with his property. In the case of a man living in Northumberland, was he to come up to town to obtain the sanction of the Board of Trade, or to employ agents for that purpose?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he would again express his readiness, if the Amendment was withdrawn, to postpone the clause, with the object, in the mean time, of endeavouring to render its wording more generally acceptable.

MR. C. TURNER said, that the analogy between telegraph and railway companies was imperfect. Railway companies could not act without notice. The power conferred by the Bill, on the other hand, was a more arbitrary infringement of private rights. He was advised by high legal authorities, that if the Bill became law, no man across whose land telegraph wires passed would be able, in future, to sell that property, without previously obtaining the consent of the Board of Trade. In many cases, where the offer was made conditionally upon immediate possession being given, the restriction would seriously damage the value of the land, if it did not prevent the owner from parting with it altogether. He hoped it would be made imperative on telegraph companies to remove their wires when required to do so.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he believed one of the objects of the Bill was to protect certain existing companies which had received powers to erect their posts and wires surreptitiously. He himself was a sufferer from the existing system; and he therefore trusted that it would be made clear that the clause applied to them.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that the hon. and learned Member for East Gloucestershire (Mr. Rolt) had entirely misrepresented the Bill. The sixteenth clause provided that no company should place any works upon any land or building without the consent of the owner, occupier, or lessee, and therefore it was not correct to say that the measure authorized the taking of land or property without compensation. The only property with which it interfered was property in the air, in cases where the wires passed over houses in towns.

MR. ROLT said, that was exactly what he objected to. That was the first time that Parliament had been asked to interfere with any right of property without providing for the compensation of the owner.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that such powers were contained in existing Acts. The measure before the Committee was really one to restrict telegraph companies from doing that which they could do with impunity if the Bill were never in existence. All that this clause did was to give the company a right of appeal to the arbitration of a third party in case of any disputes arising between the company and the owners of property.

MR. BLACKBURN said, that the right hon. Gentleman wished to give the Board of Trade power to restrain companies, but that was a duty which Parliament itself ought to discharge.

MR. HENLEY said, that in his reference to retrospective legislation, the right hon. Gentleman had not been quite candid. The last paragraph of the 18th clause provided that any landowner who wanted to re-obtain possession of any land over which wires had been carried, should give full compensation to the company. He hoped that that clause would be withdrawn.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

MR. DALGLISH said, he would move after Clause 6 to insert a clause requiring a telegraph company to pay an annual rent for the use of streets or roads, at such a rate as might be fixed by the Board of Trade.

MR. MILNER GIBSON opposed the clause. He did not see why these companies should be placed in a more disadvantageous position than gas or water companies.

Clause negatived.

MR. BUTT said, he would move the insertion of the following clause after Clause 14:—

“Whenever in Ireland any street or public road shall be under the control of any grand jury of a county, then and in that case the county surveyor shall, for the purposes of this Act, at all times when such grand jury shall not be assembled, exercise all the powers, rights, and duties in this Act declared to belong to the body having the control of such street or public road.”

COLONEL DUNNE said, he objected to the powers of the grand jury being delegated to the county surveyor, as proposed by the clause.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN suggested that the notice might be given to the county surveyor or to the secretary of the grand juries, provided it was inoperative until the grand juries themselves met and decided whether they would object or consent to the proposed works.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he would promise to confer with persons acquainted with Ireland and Irish law, and to take the notice into consideration.

Clause withdrawn.

MR. DILLWYN said, he wished to move an additional clause, having for its object the removal of posts which had been already placed by any existing company on any part of a public road in positions which were, in the judgment of the body having the control of such road, dangerous to the public.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he did not object to the principle of the clause, but he did not think the form of it would do. He would prepare a clause with the same object, and bring it up on the Report.

Clause withdrawn.

MR. LYGON proposed a clause, providing that any proprietor whose property had been injuriously affected by the works of a telegraph company might apply to the Board of Trade, which Board, on being satisfied that the complaint was well founded, might require the company to repair the injury.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that the clause only proposed to do what was meant to be done by the 26th clause; and he thought it ought to be considered in connection with the Amendment in that clause.

MR. BLACKBURN observed that the 26th clause only applied to cases in which the work was carried on over the land of a proprietor. The clause of the hon. Member applied to those in which it was carried over roads in front of a man's property.

MR. ROLT said, he also saw a distinction between the two clauses. He wished, however, to ask whether the Committee were to understand that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade acceded to the proposition now before them.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he saw no objection to the clause; but was unable to perceive any difference between the two clauses, except that the 26th clause was rather more stringent than that now proposed.

MR. WALPOLE said, he thought the Bill and the Amendments ought to be reprinted before the Committee proceeded further, as the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade could not see what appeared to him to be a plain distinction. The 26th clause only applied to cases in which property was directly interfered with. The clause now under consideration would reach cases in which it was injuriously affected.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he was of opinion that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade should accept the clause, as he did not object to its principle.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID suggested that further time should be given to hon. Members to consider the clause before they were asked to decide on its adoption or rejection.

MR. MILNER GIBSON suggested that the clause should be withdrawn for the present, and promised that he would give the subject his attention before the Report.

Clause withdrawn.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Monday 13th April, and to be printed. [Bill 75.]

OFFICE OF SECRETARY AT WAR ABOLITION BILL.

[BILL 72.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he rose to move the second reading of the Bill, the object of which was to abolish in name an office which had been in reality abolished during the period of the Crimean War. Before that time the duties of the War Department had been divided between the Secretary for War, who was also Secretary for the Colonies—the Secretary at War, who was always a Member of the House of Commons—the Board of Ordnance, and the Commissariat, the business of which was always transacted at the Treasury. Owing to the pressure produced on these Departments by the Crimean war, it was thought expedient to separate the office of Secretary of State for War from that of Secretary for the Colonies, and in the distinct office thus created was concentrated the whole business belonging to the War Department. The Board of Ordnance was abolished, the Commissariat was transferred to the War Office; but the office of Secretary at War, which had certain functions imposed on it by Act of Parliament, was still kept up and held by the Secretary for War under a separate commission. There were no separate duties to be discharged by the office, and no separate salary attached to it, and the object of the Bill was to abolish an office which for some time had had no duties to discharge.

Mr. Milner Gibson

Mr. HENNESSY said, that the office which it was proposed to abolish sprang from the Royal prerogative; and depended on it alone. The Bill was therefore an infringement of that prerogative. In the Act of 1858, with reference to a fifth Secretary of State for India, the preamble distinctly set forth that the provisions were to take effect only if Her Majesty should be pleased to appoint another Secretary. He held that a similar acknowledgment of the right of the Crown ought to be inserted in the present Bill. Last Session, the right hon. Gentleman set at naught the Royal prerogative in his measure on the subject of officers' commissions; and the Amendment which he suggested on that occasion, although not accepted by the House, was adopted in another place.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for Monday 13th April.

OATHS RELIEF IN CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

[BILL 74.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. CRAUFURD said, the object of the Bill was to extend to Scotland the English law in regard to relief from oaths in criminal proceedings. He moved that it be read a second time.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, there was no objection to assimilating the law of the two countries in this respect.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for Monday 13th April.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT (1858) AMENDMENT BILL—[BILL 69.]

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that although the Local Government Act was originally intended only for populous towns, a great many very small places had availed themselves of it. It had been adopted, for instance, in twenty-two districts which had less than 100 inhabitants, and in 130 with between 100 and 500. Indeed, places with only seventeen, eighteen, twenty-three, twenty-five, and thirty-seven inhabitants respectively had passed resolutions for adopting it. The reason of that excessive fondness for the Act was, that those places where it was in force were exempted from the operation of the Highway Act. It was therefore adopted in many cases simply to evade the latter statute, and without any intention of carrying out the provisions of the Local Government Act. The object of the present Bill was to put a check on such proceedings. It provided that no places with less than 3,000 inhabitants should have absolute power to adopt the Act without control. Such places were required to make application to the Home Office for permission to avail themselves of the Act, stating the special grounds upon which they required it. The Secretary of State would be at liberty either to accede to the application, or, after an inquiry, on the spot to refuse it. The period of appeal was also extended from twenty-one days to six weeks. Places which had accepted the Act were empowered to abandon it voluntarily if they desired to do so. Another important clause provided, that if after adopting the Act any place of a population under 3,000 did not take steps within two months to appoint a local board, or, after that had been done, to elect the officers mentioned in the Act, then the adoption of the measure in that place should be void. The Bill had been framed in accordance with suggestions and requests from all parts of the country, and he hoped the House would agree to it. He moved that it be read a second time.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for Monday, 13th April.

SALMON FISHERIES (IRELAND) BILL.

[BILL 1.]

COMMITTEE. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [4th March], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," and which Amendment was, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Bill be committed to a Select Committee,"—(Lord Fermoy.)—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

CAPTAIN ESMONDE moved that the debate be adjourned.

COLONEL FRENCH said, it was clear that an attempt was being made to defeat the Bill by talking. He hoped the opponents of the Bill would consent to go into Committee pro forma, and so relieve Mr.

Speaker from the disagreeable necessity of hearing the same arguments repeated ad nauseam.

CAPTAIN STACPOOLE said, he was also in favour of going into Committee.

COLONEL WHITE said, he should oppose the Bill. He wished the matter to be settled, but he should oppose any Bill on the subject which was brought forward by the hon. and learned Member for Wexford.

MR. M'MAHON said, he thought it was hardly becoming or decent for a Lord of the Treasury to make such a remark. The hon. and gallant Colonel was not even an Irish Member; he represented an English constituency, which had a great interest in buying Irish fish cheap, and he should be one of the last to oppose the progress of the Bill. It was evidently the object of some hon. Gentlemen to talk the Bill out of the House, but he would insist on a division, not with a view of making any progress in Committee, but in order that the Irish people might know who were for the Bill and who were against it. Should the House go into Committee that night, he would have no objection to postpone the further consideration of the Bill till after Easter.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he trusted that after the protracted discussion which had already taken place the House would go into Committee, so that after the recess the Bill might be fairly considered, with the various Amendments of which notice had been given. Too much had been said about private interests. He had no desire to interfere with the just and legal rights of individual proprietors; but Salmon Fisheries Bills having been passed for England and Scotland, there was no reason why the House should not legislate for Ireland also. The duty of the House was to watch over the public interests, and to pass such Bills as might be deemed fair or necessary.

LORD FERMOY suggested, that the debate should be adjourned, in order that the Irish Government might have an opportunity of considering whether they could not take the matter up and effect a compromise, as the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland was the only likely authority to achieve that object; certainly the hon. and learned Member for Wexford was not the best person to do it.

MR. MONSELL said, that if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary were to legislate on the subject, he could only do so by proposing Amendments in Committee. An adjournment of the debate would only lead to another discussion of six hours' duration, and a further repetition of the same arguments which had been already twice put forward.

Colonel French

SIR GEORGE GREY remarked, that the Government had no power to take the Bill out of the hands of the hon. and learned Member for Wexford. His right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary was ready to propose clauses in Committee, but he could do nothing more. He hoped the House would go into Committee, on the understanding that no progress should be made till after Easter.

LORD NAAS said, he approved the principle of the Bill, but was prepared to accept a compromise. A policy of obstruction never succeeded, in the end, in that House. All who took an interest in the subject felt that some legislation was necessary. Unless some means were taken to check the enormous over-capture of salmon in the Irish rivers, a permanent destruction of the fish must ensue. He hoped that that stage of the Bill would now be allowed to be taken.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 5; Noes 50: Majority 45.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

COLONEL WHITE said, he wished to make another Motion.

MR. SPEAKER said, that it was incompetent for the hon. and gallant Member to do so.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Monday 27th April.

STOCK CERTIFICATES TO BEARER BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he rose to move for leave to introduce a Bill relative to stock certificates to bearer. At that late hour he would not enter into a lengthened explanation of the principles of the Bill, but would simply state that its object was to give additional facilities for holding and dealing in the public stocks, particularly with a view to a certain class of persons, who were in the habit of holding public stocks for the purpose of borrowing, and also on account of those who might desire to deal in or hold them, without having the advantage of a residence in London, the centre of all such transactions. The Bill would, he believed, be attended with great public convenience. One point might be referred to on the present occasion—namely, that he proposed to disable trustees from holding funds or public stocks in that particular form, and to confine them to the method of registry now in use. He should reserve to himself the right of making further statements and explanations on the second reading.

Leave given.

Bill to give further facilities to the Holders of the Public Stocks, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and Mr. PERL.

Bill presented, and read 1°. [Bill 76.]

House adjourned at half
after One o'clock.

APPENDIX.

DIVISION LIST on the Second Reading of the AFFIRMATIONS BILL, Wednesday 11 March 1863 (see page 1285).

AFFIRMATIONS BILL.—Order for Second Reading read; Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Attorney General :)—Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."—The House divided; Ayes 96, Noes 142.

AYES.

Adair, H. E.	Kinglake, A. W.
Adam, W. P.	Knatchbull-Hugessen, E.
Angerstein, W.	Layard, A. H.
Ayrton, A. S.	Lawson, W.
Baring, T. G.	Leatham, E. A.
Barnes, T.	Levinge, Sir R.
Bazley, T.	Lewis, H.
Beaumont, W. B.	Looke, J.
Berkeley, hon. C. P. F.	Merry, J.
Black, A.	Mildmay, H. F.
Browne, Lord J. T.	Miller, W.
Buller, Sir A. W.	Morris, D.
Butler, C. S.	North, F.
Buxton, C.	Ogilvy, Sir J.
Carnegie, hon. C.	Onslow, G.
Clay, J.	Paget, C.
Clifton, Sir R. J.	Pender, J.
Cobden, R.	Pilkington, J.
Coningham, W.	Pollard-Urquhart, W.
Cox, W.	Ponsonby, hon. A.
Craufurd, E. H. J.	Portman, hon. W. H. B.
Crawford, R. W.	Potter, E.
Davey, R.	Pugh, D.
Dodson, J. G.	Raynham, Viscount
Doulton, F.	Roebuck, J. A.
Duff, M. E. G.	Russell, A.
Dundas, F.	St. Aubyn, J.
Evans, Sir De L.	Scholefield, W.
Ewing, H. E. Crum-	Seely, C.
Fenwick, H.	Seymour, H. D.
Forster, W. E.	Seymour, A.
Gibson, rt. hon. T. M.	Sheridan, H. B.
Gilpin, C.	Sidney, T.
Glyn, G. C.	Smith, J. B.
Goldsmid, Sir F. H.	Stanley, hon. W. O.
Gower, hon. F. L.	Stansfeld, J.
Gower, G. W. G. L.	Stuart, Colonel
Greene, J.	Taylor, P. A.
Gregory, W. H.	Tite, W.
Gregson, S.	Turner, J. A.
Grenfell, H. R.	Verney, Sir H.
Hadfield, G.	Wemyss, J. H. E.
Hanbury, R.	Western, S.
Hankey, T.	Westhead, J. P. B.
Hartington, Marquess of	Williams, W.
Henley, Lord	Wyvill, M.
Hibbert, J. T.
Ingham, R.
Jervoise, Sir J. C.	TELLERS.
King, hon. P. J. L.	Sir J. Trelawny
	Sir C. Douglas

NOES.

Adderley, rt. hon. C. B.	Beecroft, G. S.
Addington, hon. W. W.	Bentinck, G. W. P.
Agnew, Sir A.	Bentinck, G. C.
Annesley, hon. Col. H.	Benyon, R.
Arbuthnott, hon. Gen.	Berkeley, hon. H. F.
Ashley, Lord	Blackburn, P.
Baillie, H. J.	Blake, J.
Baring, T.	Blencowe, J. G.
Barttelot, Colonel	Bouverie, hon. P. P.
Bathurst, A. A.	Bridges, Sir B. W.

Bruce, Major C.	Lennox, C. S. B. H. K.
Bruce, H. A.	Leslie, C. P.
Burghley, Lord	Leslie, W.
Burrell, Sir P.	Liddell, hon. H. G.
Butt, I.	Lindsay, hon. General
Cave, S.	Lopes, Sir M.
Chapman, J.	Lyall, G.
Clive, Capt. hon. G. W.	Lygon, hon. F.
Cobbett, J. M.	Macdonogh, F.
Codrington, Sir W.	MacEvoy, E.
Cubitt, G.	Martin, P. W.
Cubitt, W.	Martin, J.
Du Cane, C.	Mills, A.
Duncombe, hon. A.	Mitford, W. T.
Duncombe, hon. W. E.	Montagu, Lord R.
Dundas, rt. hon. Sir D.	Montgomery, Sir G.
Egerton, Sir P. G.	Morgan, O.
Egerton, E. C.	Morriss, W. J. S.
Egerton, hon. W.	Mowbray, rt. hon. J. R.
Elcho, Lord	Noel, hon. G. J.
Elphinstone, Sir J. D.	North, Colonel
Enfield, Viscount	Packe, C. W.
Fane, Colonel J. W.	Packe, Colonel
Farquhar, Sir M.	Pakington, rt. hon. Sir J.
Foley, H. W.	Papillon, P. O.
Forde, Colonel	Patten, Colonel W.
Fortescue, hon. F. D.	Peel, rt. hon. General
Gard, R. S.	Pevensey, Viscount
Getty, S. G.	Powell, F. S.
Goddard, A. L.	Puller, C. W. G.
Greaves, E.	Rogers, J. J.
Grey, rt. hon. Sir G.	Rose, W. A.
Griffith, C. D.	Rowley, hon. R. T.
Grogan, Sir E.	Slater-Booth, G.
Haliburton, T. C.	Scott, Lord H.
Hardy, G.	Scourfield, J. H.
Hardy, J.	Selwyn, C. J.
Hartopp, E. B.	Seymer, H. K.
Hay, Sir J. C. D.	Smith, M.
Heathcote, hon. G. H.	Smollett, P. B.
Henley, rt. hon. J. W.	Somerset, Colonel
Henniker, Lord	Somes, J.
Hesketh, Sir T. G.	Stanhope, J. B.
Holland, E.	Stuart, Lt.-Col. W.
Hopwood, J. T.	Sturt, H. G.
Hornby, W. H.	Sturt, Lt.-Col. N.
Hotham, Lord	Tollemache, J.
Hunt, G. W.	Trefusis, hon. C. H. R.
Johnstone, J. J. H.	Turner, C.
Johnstone, Sir J.	Upton, hon. General
Jolliffe, H. H.	Vansittart, W.
Kekewich, S. T.	Verner, Sir W.
Kendall, N.	Walker, J. R.
Kingcote, Colonel	Watlington, J. W. P.
Knatchbull, W. F.	Whitmore, H.
Knightley, R.	Wickham, H. W.
Laird, J.	Willoughby, Sir H.
Leader, N. P.	Woodd, B. T.
Leffroy, A.	Wynne, C. W. W.
Legh, Major C.
Legh, W. J.	TELLERS.
Lennox, Lord G. G.	Sir W. Atherton
Lennox, Lord H. G.	Sir J. Ferguson

INDEX

TO

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

VOLUME CLXIX.

FIRST VOLUME OF SESSION 1863.

EXPLANATION OF THE ABBREVIATIONS.

In Bills, Read 1^o, 2^o, 3^o, or 1^a, 2^a, 3^a, Read the First, Second, or Third Time.—In Speeches, 1R., 2R., 3R., Speech delivered on the First, Second, or Third Reading.—Amendt., Amendment.—Comm., Committee.—Re-Comm., Re-Committal.—Rep., Report.—Consid., Consideration.—Adj., Adjournment or Adjourned.—cl., Clause.—add. cl., Additional Clause.—neg., Negatived.—M. Q., Main Question.—O. Q., Original Question.—O. M., Original Motion.—P. Q., Previous Question.—R. P., Report Progress.—A., Ayes.—N., Noes.—M., Majority.—1st. Div., 2nd. Div., First or Second Division.—L., Lords.—c., Commons.

When in the Text or in the Index a Speech is marked thus *, it indicates that the Speech is reprinted from a Pamphlet or some authorized Report.

When in the Index a † is prefixed to a Name or an Office (the Member having accepted or vacated office during the Session) and to Subjects of Debate thereunder, it indicates that the Speeches on those Subjects were delivered in the speaker's private or official character, as the case may be.

When in this Index a * is added to the Reading of a Bill, it indicates that no Debate took place upon that stage of the measure.

ABBEOKUTA, Vice Consul at
Question, Mr. Digby Seymour, 664; Answer, Mr. Layard, 667

Acts of Uniformity Amendment Bill
(No. 1) (Lord Ebury)
1. Read 1^o Feb. 5

ABDERLEY, Right Hon. C. B., Staffordshire, W.

Acting Teachers, Examination of, 1228, 1251
Army Estimates—Commissariat Establishment, 1453
Security from Violence, Leave, 785; 2R. 1303, 1304
Transportation and Penal Servitude, Resolution, 1229

ADDINGTON, Hon. W. W., Devises
Army Estimates—Volunteers, 1708
China, Naval Aid to, 1607, 1608
Navy Estimates—New Works, 1111

Address to Her Majesty on the Lords Commissioners' Speech, see Parliament

Adjournment of the House—The Prince of Wales' Marriage
Observations, Visct. Palmerston, 725, 727, 1130

Admiralty Court (Ireland) Bill [Bill 45]
(Mr. Maguire, Mr. Longfield)
c. Read 1^o Mar. 2

ADVOCATE, The Lord (Right Hon. J. Moncreiff) Edinburgh
Vagrancy in Scotland, 967

Affirmations Bill [Bill 11]
(Sir J. Trelawny, Mr. Dillwyn)

c. Read 1^o Feb. 10, 228
Second Reading moved (Sir J. Trelawny)
Mar. 11, 1285; Amendt. (Attorney General)
"upon this day six months," 1290; On Question, "That 'now' &c."—A. 96, N. 142, M. 46
Bill put off for six months
Division List, Ayes and Noes, APPENDIX.

Aggravated Assaults on Women and Children Bill [Bill 15] (Visct. Raynham, Dr. Brady, Mr. M'Mahon)

c. Read 1^o Feb. 11
Second Reading moved (Viscount Raynham)
Feb. 18, 471; Amendt. "upon this day six months" (Mr. Ald. Sidney), 472; On Question, "That 'now' &c."—A. 43, N. 153, M. 110
Bill put off for six months

to the Consolidated Fund was insufficient to cover the charges placed upon it. In addition to the increased expense occasioned by the embassy to China and to Japan, there was this year a new Vote for the payment of an attaché, and he feared that from year to year there would be an increase of such Votes. He did not offer any opinion as to whether a portion of the charge for the diplomatic service ought not to be borne by the Consolidated Fund, but he thought it desirable that the House should have the control of the great body of the expenditure.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided :—Ayes 136; Noes 65: Majority 71.

DISTINGUISHED SERVICE COLONELS— COLONEL DUDLEY CARLETON.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he rose to call attention to the case of a number of officers of the army whose claims had been reported upon favourably by a Committee of the War Office, and had also been admitted to be deserving of consideration by the authorities of that Department. He had mentioned the name of Colonel Dudley Carleton in his notice, but there were several other officers in a similar position. These officers were promoted to the rank of colonel for distinguished service in the field previous to the Warrant of October 6th, 1854, which was, no doubt, a salutary and necessary measure, but had occasioned much individual hardship. To such an amount of discontent did it give rise, that a Commission was appointed in 1858 to inquire into its operation. The principal recommendations of the Commission were embodied in the warrant of 1858, which remedied many of the grievances. A number of cases, including those of Colonel Dudley Carleton and some others, were, however, left undecided by the Commission, but were recommended to the favourable consideration of the War Office. There was some question whether these officers came within the scope of the memorandum which was published with the brevet of the 20th of June, 1854, and which declared that officers promoted under that brevet would receive their promotions subject to new regulations about to be promulgated by Royal warrant. The officers held that they were beyond the terms of that memorandum, as it applied simply to those officers who obtained promotion under the brevet and not to such as were subsequently promoted in regimental succession. The Committee of general officers who inquired into the matter in 1861 took an opposite view. The officers in question, however, rested their claims on another ground, and that was the favourable recommendation of the Commission of 1858, which was endorsed by the Committee of 1861. The Secretary of State for War also agreed in that recommendation, for Major General Lugard, on behalf of the War Office, on the 8th of November last, urged the Horse Guards to give effect to that paragraph in the Report. The recommendation of the War Office would, it might be thought, carry with it a certainty of being attended to; but it was not acted upon, because the Commander-in-Chief stated in a communication dated the 7th of February, 1863, that having considered the question, he was of opinion that the objections to the proposal were so great that he did not feel justified in agreeing to it. His Royal Highness did not give any reason, and it was a rather curious circumstance that in the beginning he was of a directly contrary opinion. At present, then, the matter stood thus :—It had always been acknowledged that Colonel Carleton and the other officers were injuriously affected by the Warrant of 1854, and a Committee, which differed upon other cases, had reported unanimously in favour of theirs. The Secretary of State for War had intimated his acquiescence in that Report, and, in fact, the only objectors were the authorities at the Horse Guards, who seemed to think they had a controlling voice in all matters connected with military affairs. But what he could not understand was, as he had already stated, that the authorities at the Horse Guards were originally favourable to the claim of Colonel Carleton and the other officers, and that it was the Secretary for War who opposed their promotion. The parties had changed sides, and now the Horse Guards were the only objectors. That, he submitted, was rather hard upon the gallant officers. Colonel Carleton served during the whole of the Crimean war without receiving any promotion whatever. In his regiment no less than sixteen out of thirty officers were killed, and it was to that he owed his high regimental position. He had received a colonelcy, but a large number of lieutenant colonels had stepped over his head in consequence of the Warrant of 1854, and he still felt himself under grievous disadvantages. It was on that account that he had wished his case to be brought under the notice of the House, and unless he received some satisfactory statement from the Secretary of State on that occasion, he should, in all probability, think it his duty to move for the appointment of a Select Committee after Easter.

Mr. Selater-Booth

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the class of officers to whom the hon. Gentleman had called attention was limited, consisting only of three; and one of them had obtained his promotion, and was now full colonel. The only effect of the change sought by his hon. Friend was, that he could hold a different position among the class of full colonels. His place in the Army List would not be the same as at present. There were two classes of officers who were affected by the Warrant of 1854. There was one class known as the colonels of distinguished service, who were tolerably numerous, whose case was the subject of the correspondence recently laid upon the table, and upon which notice of Motion had been given by the gallant Gentleman opposite (General Lindsay). Now, the case of these distinguished service colonels stood upon wholly different grounds from that of the three officers whose case had been brought before them. That case related to promotion in the Guards. It would be impossible to deny that the Warrant of 1854 injuriously affected certain individual officers in the Guards. Their case, however, was considered by a Commission in 1858, the Members being the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke of Newcastle, Lord Grey, Lord Panmure, Lord Rokeby, Mr. Sidney Herbert, Mr. Edward Ellice, Sir James Scarlett, Sir Fenwick Williams, Sir Frederic Smith, Sir Henry Storks, and General Eyre. A more competent Commission could not have been appointed, and, after careful inquiry, they did not recommend any alteration in the mode of promotion in the Guards introduced by the Warrant of 1854. The system had consequently been continued up to the present time. When such a rule had been acted upon and acquiesced in for a considerable number of years, even assuming it was not perfectly just in its operation, inflicting hardship on particular persons, it was extremely difficult for those intrusted with the administration of promotion by an ex post facto regulation to step in and alter it. The War Office, moved by the recommendation of the last Committee, brought the matter under the consideration of the Horse Guards; but the Commander-in-Chief, who was the proper head of the discipline and promotion of the army, having made a careful inquiry, and having heard the statements of the various officers who would be injuriously affected if the proposed alteration took place, came to the conclusion, that whatever evil there might be in the present state of things, it was less than that which the suggested remedy would entail. Nothing could be more certain than that when such variations were made one set of complainants was substituted for another, and the only effect of granting the application of Colonel Carleton and his brother officers would be to raise up a more numerous class of petitioners. Under these circumstances, while admitting that the Warrant of 1854 injuriously affected certain officers, he was not prepared to say, looking at what had taken place, and considering the extent of time over which the rule had been acted upon, that the decision of the Commander-in-Chief was not strictly just.

GENERAL LINDSAY said, he thought the case of these officers one of peculiar hardship. They were a body who were hit by the Warrant of 1854 more severely than any other class. It occurred in this way. That warrant was by a retrospective clause made applicable to the 20th of June, 1854. At that date these officers were senior captains at the head of their respective regiments, and in a fortnight or three weeks afterwards they were promoted to the rank of lieutenant colonels. If they had been majors, they would have had first to become lieutenant colonels before the warrant could affect them; but being the senior captains of their respective regiments they were affected at once; and no fewer than 200 lieutenant colonels had gone over their heads in the last nine or ten years. The question brought before the Commission which had been referred to was the general claim made by the senior officers of the Guards, on the part of the captains and lieutenant colonels, that they might not be so hardly dealt with as they had been by the Warrant of 1854. The Commissioners expressed the opinion that the case was one to be carefully watched by the Commander-in-Chief; and if the general claim was found to be such as had been represented to them by Lord Rokeby, it should be rectified with the consent of his Royal Highness and the Secretary for State by giving them special promotion. But the case of the particular class of officers now under discussion was not specially brought before the Commissioners. That special case was, that they had been promoted between the 20th of June and the 6th of October, 1854. Their claim could not perhaps be legally enforced as long as the warrant was held to have a retrospective operation; but if ever there was a case which should have been leniently and considerably dealt with, it was the present. The Secretary of State had himself thought so, and had pointed out to the Commander-in-Chief that all the lieutenant colonels of the line promoted between those two dates had already been removed, either by retirement or promotion, these few officers alone being now left. While the Commissioners of 1854 recommended that all lieutenant colonels of the line should be promoted on three years' effective service, they also recommended that the existing captains and lieutenant colonels of the Guards should be promoted on completing six years' service, or just double the period for the line. He thought that term of six years might fairly have been extended to the officers promoted between the 20th of June and the 6th of October 1854, without the least injustice to any other class of officers. Their case was one eminently deserving of generous treatment, and he trusted that before the hon. Gentleman opposite had an opportunity of bringing it forward again, it would receive favourable consideration at the hands of the Secretary of State.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, it was impossible for any one to read the particulars without admitting that the case was one of as great hardship as could possibly be inflicted; and he really could not understand how it was that the Secretary of State for War could have altered his opinion in so short a time, because they had his letter in favour of the officers only four months ago. The Commissioners reported one way, and the Commander-in-Chief differed from them. An umpire was therefore wanted between them, and the right hon. Gentleman ought to be that umpire. They often heard of the privileges of the Guards being greater than those of the Line; but the papers relating to the case showed that the fact of Colonel Carleton belonging to the Guards had operated seriously to his prejudice. For an officer of distinguished service, who was looking forward to the higher rank of general, to have two hundred of his juniors placed over him was no light matter, and it would seem as if in this instance there was something more than met the eye. As one of the public, he thought injustice had been done to these three or four deserving officers, and he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would represent the circumstances again to the Horse Guards, so as to obviate the necessity for a special Committee of Inquiry.

General Lindsay

COLONEL DUNNE said, he thought it very unwise to raise the questions about the privileges of the Guards. No doubt there were anomalies; but if officers in the Guards had other officers promoted over their heads, they should recollect that they had themselves enjoyed a great advantage over the Line.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he was sorry to differ from his hon. and gallant Friend, with whom he generally acted on military questions; but he did not think that the question had anything to do with the privileges of the Guards. He objected, as a general rule, to matters of discipline being brought under the consideration of the House. The case which had been submitted to the House was one of peculiar hardship, which might be easily rectified without injury to the service, or to the discipline of the army; and he thought that if the Commander-in-Chief were supported by the Secretary for War, and by the opinion of the House, justice would be done, and he trusted the matter would be taken into serious consideration.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £1,953,000, on account of certain Civil Services.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he objected to being called upon unexpectedly to vote so large a sum of money upon account before the whole of the Estimates were laid upon the table. He further objected to so doing when there were admitted to be considerable balances in hand. He wished for some explanation from the Secretary to the Treasury upon that point. In one class alone he understood there was no less a balance than £620,000; why should they vote more money than was absolutely wanted for any one branch?

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he regarded Votes on account as injurious to a proper supervision of expenditure; but as the balances of various Votes were paid into the Exchequer, his objection was not so strong as it otherwise would have been.

MR. CHILDERS said, the Committee might really be congratulated on the Vote, because it was owing to the adoption of the principle recommended by the Committee on Public Accounts which had been presided over by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Portsmouth (Sir Francis Baring)—namely, that of making the Estimates include not the sums required for the service of the year, but the sums that would actually become payable within the year. Under the old system, the balance of a Vote once taken was transferred from year to year till the whole was expended. That practice had been abolished, and the balances which remained in hand on the 31st of March were handed back to the Exchequer. With regard to the present Vote, it was taken on account of the Civil Service Estimates as a whole, not as instalment of each particular Vote. There would thus be no obstacle in the future discussion of the Estimates.

MR. PEEL said, the Vote on account was rendered necessary by the change that was made in the last Session in the manner of voting the Civil Service Estimates. The sums voted last year were for payments falling due in 1862-3; therefore any payment falling due after the 31st of March could not, with a due respect to the provisions of the Appropriation Act, be made out of the sums voted during the last year. As to this Vote on account being suddenly presented to the House, he would only observe that it had always been stated that the change of form in which these Estimates were now presented would necessarily require a Vote on account to be taken. He trusted the Committee would agree to the Vote, for otherwise the new plan would certainly fail.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he wished to know when the year began and ended? Were the payments for salaries due on March 31 made in 1862-3 or in 1863-4?

MR. PEEL said, that payments which became due at the end of the quarter would be paid on the following day, and would form part of the amount to be voted by the Committee for the coming year.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he thought it incomprehensible that the payments for the last quarter of one year should be made in the first quarter of the next year.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that a perfect system required, according to the idea of the hon. Gentleman, that all payments for the expiring year should be made while the clock was striking twelve on the night of the last day of the last quarter. Such a perfect system, however, was impossible, and the system pursued was to make all payments as speedily as possible after they became due. When payments became due upon the lapse of fixed periods, the payments could only be made when those terms had expired. In the case of the National Debt, the half-year did not terminate at the same time as the Government quarter. The difficulty, however, was more apparent than real, and was so incident to human affairs that he despaired of overcoming it.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that as a Member of the Select Committee he wished to thank the right hon. Gentleman for adopting their recommendations with respect to the public accounts. They appeared to work very satisfactorily.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £574,154, Customs Department.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY remarked that there was a slight increase in the Vote. From the remission of Customs duties which had taken place of late, one would have expected some reduction in the charges; but such was not the fact. In 1861-2 and in 1862-3 the Vote was identical with the present; but in the year 1861-2 the expenditure was £731,625 only, or £22,525 less than the Vote. For what was the £754,154 wanted, if £731,625 was sufficient that year? Probably, the right hon. Secretary to the Treasury could give some explanations on the point.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that a reduction of upwards of £82,000 in the Vote had been promised. Instead of that, he found there had been an increase.

MR. PEEL said, that if the hon. Gentleman would compare the amount of the Vote with that at which it stood some years ago, he would find that since the changes which had taken place in this Department a reduction in the Vote to a considerable extent had taken place. The principal reduction then made was in the number of examining officers; but the great increase of business which had since taken place had rendered a corresponding increase necessary in the Vote. It would also be observed that the salaries had a minimum and maximum amount. It was probable, that when the large official changes took place some years ago, many of the officers entered at the minimum salaries which had since been increasing, and thus the Vote had become enlarged in amount. A Committee upstairs was, however, making inquiries into the Government establishments in all the parts of the country. Of course, any recommendation which that Committee might make would be duly attended to, but at that moment it had not reported.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £1,351,771, Inland Revenue Department.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that under this head also, as compared with the actual expenditure of 1861-2, the present Estimate showed an increase of £57,569.

MR. PEEL said, there was a reduction, as compared with the Estimate of last year, amounting to £30,000. He could only account for the difference mentioned by the hon. Baronet by supposing that in 1861-2 there were some offices vacant or salaries not drawn.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, it was remarkable that these salaries always crept up and never crept down.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that they wanted to know not so much what past Estimates had been, as the actual expenditure in past years.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £2,098,920, Post Office Services, &c.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, the vast increase in this Department might well alarm the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and there was great danger of the whole Post Office revenue being swallowed up in charges. The revenue from that Department in round numbers amounted to £3,500,000, but the salaries and expenses exceeded £2,000,000. As compared with actual expenditure in 1861-2, the present Estimates showed an increase of £28,250, and there was a further sum of £75,000 for contingencies. He wished to know whether the Estimate included all the salaries and expenses of the Post Office? He was inclined to think that there were other charges, without mixing up the Packet Service with the matter. He trusted that his right hon. Friend would give them some clear information on the point.

Mr. Peel

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he did not understand why the sum asked for in the present year should be larger than the Vote of last year.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to ask what arrangement had been made for meeting the expense of the Post Office savings banks?

MR. PEEL said, that that expense did not fall within the Estimates. The increase mentioned by the hon. Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby) was to be accounted for by the continual additions made to the provincial establishments. An increase had also been made in the pay of sorters and letter carriers in the circulating department. The total increase in the Estimate over that of last year amounted to £14,233.

MR. AYRTON inquired whether he was to understand that all the expense connected with the Post Office savings banks was paid out of the interest derived from the money of the depositors, and was not brought into the present Estimate. He was not aware that any authority was given by the Act to the Government to do that.

MR. PEEL replied in the affirmative.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he desired to have it explained how it happened that such an immense sum as £75,000 was asked for on account of contingencies; and he also wanted to know whether the Treasury Department exercised any clear and precise control over the Post Office.

MR. PEEL said, that no addition was ever made to the establishment of the Post Office without the matter being brought under the notice of the Treasury. With regard to the sum required for contingencies, full information would be found in the Estimates.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to ask for an explanation of the item of £37,000 for official postage.

MR. PEEL replied, that provision was made in the Civil Service Estimates for payment to the Post Office for the conveyance of official letters. In this Estimate provision was made for the conveyance of the correspondence of the Post Office itself. The receipts and expenses of the Post Office were thus shown.

Vote agreed to ; as was also—

(5.) £515,796, Superannuations and Compensation Allowances, &c.

(6.) £56,986, to complete the sum for the Houses of Parliament.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to call attention to the amount of fees paid on the passing of private Bills. It was said that the various companies and other parties applying for private Acts paid more than was sufficient to meet the expenses of both Houses of Parliament. It seemed to him monstrous that Parliament should make a large profit through the exercise of its legislative privileges, by taxing the promoters of projects beneficial to the public. He thought it would be well if a debtor and creditor account were furnished of the income and expenditure of the Private Bill Office.

MR. PEEL said, that these fees were paid into the Exchequer, and appeared in the financial accounts. At this moment there was a Committee of the House sitting to inquire into the whole subject.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he could not but complain of the great inconvenience which was occasioned by the taking of Votes on account, especially when the Committee was, as in that instance, asked to consider the Votes themselves on the very same evening. He also called attention to the rate at which these Estimates had increased of late years. In 1842 their amount was only £2,900,000 ; in 1852 £3,800,000, and that year it was £7,850,000. In 1842 the amount of Class 2, which included all the expenses of the Executive of the country, was £730,000 ; in 1852 it was but a little more than £1,000,000 ; that year it was £1,473,000.

MR. PEEL reminded the hon. Gentleman that a great number of charges which were formerly paid out of the Consolidated Fund, or by fees, now appeared in these Estimates. That was a circumstance which ought not to be lost sight of in comparing the Estimates of different years.

Vote agreed to ; as were also the following :—

(7.) £38,730, to complete the sum for the Treasury.

(8.) £19,263, to complete the sum for the Home Office.

(9.) £56,325, to complete the sum for the Foreign Office.

(10.) £23,047, to complete the sum for the Colonial Office.

(11.) £14,637, to complete the sum for the Privy Council Office.

(12.) £47,181, to complete the sum for the Board of Trade, &c.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he desired to have some explanation of the amount expended upon what he might call the office of the clerk of the weather. A table of the weather was published in the papers every day, and it was accompanied by certain forecasts which, notwithstanding the wide range which they took, were scarcely ever fulfilled. Mr. Francis Moore used to take the safe side, giving through the greater part of the month the one statement, "wind and rain ;" but since the President of the Board of Trade had assumed his privileges the intimations had been more detailed, and varied nearly every day. The effect of these predictions, with regard to sailors and fishermen, was often very injurious, either by keeping them at home when they might go to sea, or by inducing them to go to sea when they might be overtaken by storms. Only two days before the great storm of the 19th of October last Admiral Fitzroy prophesied that the weather on that day would be moderate, and it was only on the following day that, finding the weather was changing, he sent out a telegram that gales might be expected. In what he called the "Weather Book" he published the latter prediction, but not the former one. He should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade himself consulted his clerk of the weather before he started upon a voyage in his yacht. In truth, the whole thing was a burlesque, for no man could foretell the weather in so variable a climate as that of England.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, the Estimate had not yet been presented, and he therefore could not tell his hon. Friend what was its precise amount. The Vote for the Meteorological Department had, he might add, been proposed originally for the purpose of enabling this to co-operate with other countries in the collection of facts with reference to the prevalence of particular winds in parts of the ocean, and the classification of those facts, in the hope that some rules might, by means of international communication on the subject, be established, and navigators thus guided on long voyages, and enabled, by ascertaining where certain winds might be found, to shorten their time at sea. The suggestion originated with the Royal Society. A system had since sprung up of deducing, from such facts as were obtained, forecasts of the weather, for the guidance of merchant seamen in determining whether they might or might not with safety leave port. Now, operations of that description had not been contemplated when the Vote had been originally proposed, and he had therefore called the attention of the Treasury to the growing increase in the Vote, and had suggested, that as the expenditure was diverted to other purposes than the collection and classification of facts, the proper departments should put themselves in communication with the Royal Society, and learn their opinion as to whether meteorological science had arrived at a state of such perfection as to admit of forecasts of the weather being made with tolerable accuracy. The matter was therefore still unsettled; but when the Government received the report of those scientific gentlemen whom they had asked to pronounce an opinion upon it, they would be in a better position to say whether it was expedient to continue to vote the public money for the purposes to which he was adverting. Under these circumstances, his hon. Friend would not, he hoped, object to the passing of the Vote in the present year.

Mr. DILLWYN said, he was glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman that the Board of Trade had placed itself in communication with the Royal Society on the subject, inasmuch as he had very grave doubts whether the public money would be usefully expended for the object in question or not. Admiral Fitzroy's drums, as they were called, which were to be seen at some of the ports, instead of guiding, tended, in his opinion, very often to mislead the masters of vessels. Not long ago he had observed, to a friend, seeing that one of these drums was not up, that the weather was sure to be fair, but that night came on one of the worst storms we had experienced this year. On the occasion of the Prince of Wales's wedding, too, having gone down to Swansea, where there were some demonstrations to do honour to the event, it so happened that he found one of those drums was up.

Mr. Milner Gibson

Everybody, as a consequence, feared that a storm was at hand, but, instead, there were two or three days of very fine weather. Thus, on two occasions within his own knowledge, those signals were at fault.

Mr. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that as the subject was under consideration he would not further oppose the Vote.

Vote agreed to; as were also the following Votes:—

(13.) £1,994, to complete the sum for the Privy Seal Office.

(14.) £6,741, to complete the sum for the Civil Service Commission.

(15.) £14,640, to complete the sum for the Paymaster General's Office.

(16.) £2,923, to complete the sum for the Department of the Comptroller General of the Exchequer.

(17.) £22,857, to complete the sum for the Office of Works and Public Buildings.

(18.) £19,839, to complete the sum for the Office of Woods Forests, and Land Revenues.

(19.) £15,235, to complete the sum for the Office of Public Records, &c.

(20.) £157,424, to complete the sum for Poor Law Commissions.

(21.) £37,901, to complete the sum for the Mint.

(22.) £19,610, to complete the sum for the Inspectors of Factories, &c.

(23.) £4,316, to complete the sum for the Exchequer and other Offices in Scotland.

(24.) £2,445, to complete the sum for the Household of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

(25.) £11,580, to complete the sum for the Offices of the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

(26.) £2,752, to complete the sum for the Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums, Ireland.

(27.) £16,314, to complete the sum for the Office of Public Works, Ireland.

(28.) £25,060, to complete the sum for the Commissioners of Audit.

(29.) £14,351, to complete the sum for the Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commission.

(30.) £10,090, to complete the sum for the Inclosure and Drainage Acts; Imprest Expenses.

(31.) £35,511, to complete the sum for the General Register Offices.

(32.) £10,982, to complete the sum for the National Debt Office.

(33.) £2,910, to complete the sum for the Public Works Loan and West India Islands Relief Commissions.

(34.) £5,111, to complete the sum for the Lunacy Commissions.

(35.) £1,223, General Superintendent of County Roads, South Wales.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that so rich a district as South Wales ought not to come upon the Consolidated Fund for so paltry an amount.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he believed that it was the only amount of public money which was granted to Wales.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, he wished to ask what funds had been used to pay money under the Vote since January, as there was no balance in the Exchequer.

MR. PEEL said, that no payments had been required, and none would be made until April.

Vote agreed to; as were also the following Votes:—

(36.) £2,374, Registrars of Friendly Societies.

(37.) £12,243, to complete the sum for the Charity Commission.

(38.) £4,495, to complete the sum for the office in London under the Local Government Act, &c.

(39.) £2,342, to complete the sum for collecting Agricultural and Emigration Statistics (Ireland).

(40.) £1,193, to complete the sum for the Landed Estates Record Offices.

(41.) £1,098, to complete the sum for Quarantine Expenses.

(42.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £24,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864, for Her Majesty's Foreign and other Secret Services.”

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, there had been no time to investigate these Estimates, and he should therefore move that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.”

MR. PEEL said, he had given notice that these Estimates would be taken to-night.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(43.) £244,139, to complete the sum for Printing and Stationery.

MR. W. WILLIAMS complained of the increase in the amount of this Vote.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to ask who was responsible for that Vote, the increase in which was almost incredible. Within the last twenty-seven years the country had spent pretty nearly £8,000,000 in printing and stationery. In 1835 the cost of these items was only £125,000; in 1853 it had risen to £216,000; and the next year it doubled, nor had it ever fallen materially from that time. In 1861 it was £416,000, and in 1862, £342,000. Every year an immense amount of stuff was laid before the House of Commons, which nobody ever read, and the House got credited with extravagant expenditure in printing. A great deal of the printing set down to the House was not fairly chargeable against it. Every Department which wanted to have something printed without swelling its own bill, managed somehow to get it put down to the House of Commons. The House appointed a Committee every year, which was composed of some of the ablest Members, to assist the Speaker on questions of printing. But did that Committee ever meet?

MR. PEEL said, that the Departments were under the control of the Controller of the Stationery Department, who acted under certain rules laid down by the Treasury. If he received any application from any Department which was inconsistent with these rules, he made a special application for instructions to the Treasury. The Vote was, in fact, not so large as it seemed to be, for £40,000 was paid into the Exchequer on account of the sale of printed papers, and £19,000, voted for the printing in the Patent Office, was repaid by the fees.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he had moved for a Return some time ago, which showed that the expenditure caused by the printing of papers for the House of Commons was comparatively very small. He hoped that hon. Members would not be deterred from moving for Returns by the plea of expense. Frequently most important and useful information could be obtained from the Government in no other way than by moving for a Return.

COLONEL SYKES asked, whether the printing for the Public Departments was done by contract?

MR. PEEL said, that the printing provided for by the Vote was of three kinds—printing for the Government, printing for Her Majesty (that is, printing Acts of Parliament and Proclamations), and printing for the House. The payment of the charges for such printing was arranged in different ways.

Vote agreed to; as were also—

(44.) £90,025, to complete the sum for Postage of Letters on the Public Service.

(45.) £9,662, to complete the sum for the Treasury Chest.

(46.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £6,500, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864, for the Expedition to the Niger under the charge of Dr. Baikie.”

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that he hoped the Government would not proceed further with the Estimates that night as the Committee had not sufficient information before them to enable them to discuss the Votes which they were asked to pass.

MR. DODSON said, that eighteen Votes had been passed over in consequence of the absence of the hon. Under Secretary for the Colonies, and the result was, that a branch of the Estimates was now taken up unexpectedly, which hon. Members, who were absent, did not anticipate would be proceeded with that night.

COLONEL SYKES said, that if the Estimates had been gone through in their proper order, the items under consideration would not have come on at that early hour, in the absence of hon. Members who, perhaps, desired to take a part in their consideration, and he should therefore move that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he had frequently heard objections to proceeding with Votes at a late hour, but to object to go on because it was too early—for that seemed to be the objection here—was a rather novel course. The Government were quite ready to discuss any points that might be raised by hon. Members.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that the noble Lord was not dealing fairly with them, because it had not been anticipated that a number of Votes would be passed over, and others taken that could not have been reached had the Votes been taken in order. He had also to complain, that in consequence of the Votes given on account when they went into Committee, the sums put from the Chair were not the sums printed in the Estimates.

MR. DODSON said, he submitted that before they voted the sum for the diplomatic service, they ought to know what was the expenditure of the last year. He hoped they would postpone the Vote for that service until after Easter, and that the House in the mean time would be furnished with Returns showing them the cost of the diplomatic service for last year.

COLONEL SYKES said, the objection to proceed had not reference to the hour of the evening. The question was, were Members then prepared to go into those Votes? They were not prepared to go into them. He hoped the noble Lord would not press them to do so after such an expression of dissent from the Members of the House.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON replied, that full notice was given, and it was no argument to say that it could not have been expected that the earlier Votes could be disposed of so quickly and others come to. There were Votes that would be unopposed that might be taken.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he hoped the noble Lord would give them a pledge that the Votes for the diplomatic and consular service would not be taken that evening.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, it seemed that the object of the Government was to shuffle the Votes through without inquiry, because, of twenty-eight Votes, nineteen had been postponed to a future day. Such postponements involved confusion. He wanted the Government to give notice of the numbers of the Votes that would be taken, but they would not do that.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that the Government would not go on with the Votes for the Diplomatic Service, on which hon. Members required further information, that evening; but there were a number of other Votes which might be considered.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

The following Votes were then agreed to :—

(47.) £66,000, to complete the sum for Bounties on Slaves and Tonnaged Bounties, &c.

(48.) £6,950, to complete the sum for Mixed Commissions.

(49.) £116,462, to complete the sum for Superannuation and Retired Allowances.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wanted to know whether the Superannuation Account was not increasing.

MR. PEEL said, that as far as that year was concerned, there was a decrease in the total amount, although there had been some new superannuations on account of the abolition of the Bermuda convict establishment.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY asked whether there was not an increase in the dockyard establishment.

MR. PEEL said, he was not aware of any increase during the last two or three years.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, he wished to call attention to an omission which had occurred through some inadvertence to the Superannuation Act, in consequence of which great hardship resulted in officials who suffered personal injury while engaged in the public service. The old Act contained a provision whereby the Treasury were enabled, under special circumstances, to grant a suitable allowance to persons who were disabled, as one of the officials in the Portsmouth dockyard had been a short time since from the murderous attack of a convict. Under the present Act, however, if the official had not been in the service for a period of ten years, there was no power to make a provision for him. That was a matter which he thought required the consideration of the Government, and he trusted that the Treasury would find a way to rectify the defect.

MR. CHILDERS said, he wished to inquire what had been done in the case of the Bermuda convict officials.

MR. PEEL said, that those officials received the usual retiring allowances, with the addition of compensation for the abolition of their situations. Those who were eligible for re-employment forfeited their allowances if they declined to accept it.

MR. AYRTON said, he had often wondered whether the forfeiture of allowances on declining re-employment was ever enforced.

MR. PEEL said, it was somewhat difficult to exercise the power of re-employing superannuated officials. Lately, however, a number of Custom-house Officers, who had been superannuated, were again taken into employment.

Vote agreed to.

The following Votes were also agreed to :—

(50.) £744, for Toulonese and Corsican Emigrants, &c.

(51.) £325, for Refuge for the Destitute.

(52.) £1,966, to complete the sum for Polish Refugees and Distressed Spaniards.

MR. COX asked whether the Polish refugees had gone back to assist in the insurrection. Poland was now the proper place for them.

Vote agreed to ; as were also the following Votes :—

(53.) £55,700, Merchant Seamen's Fund Pensions.

(54.) £10,400, to complete the sum for Relief of Distressed British Seamen Abroad.

(55.) £2,625, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Allowances formerly on Civil List, &c.

(56.) £1,451, to complete the sum for Public Infirmaries (Ireland).

(57.) £1,600, to complete the sum for the Westmoreland Lock Hospital.

(58.) £700, Rotunda Lying-in Hospital.

(59.) £200, Coombe Lying-in Hospital.

(60.) £4,600, to complete the sum for the House of Industry, Dublin.

(61.) £1,500, to complete the sum for the Cork Street Fever Hospital.

(62.) £600, Meath Hospital.

(63.) £100, St. Mark's Ophthalmic Hospital.

(64.) £1,300, Dr. Steevens' Hospital.

(65.) £245, Board of Superintendence of Dublin Hospitals.

(66.) £5,847, to complete the sum for the Concordatum Fund.

(67.) £25,278, Non-conforming, Seceding, and Protestant Dissenting Ministers in Ireland.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the charge was increasing, and ought to be diminished. He would take the sense of the Committee on proceeding with it in the absence of many hon. Members who took an interest in the subject.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That a sum, not exceeding £25,278, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1864, for Non-conforming Seceding, and Protestant Dissenting Ministers in Ireland."

The Committee divided :—Ayes 53 ; Noes 26 : Majority 27.

MR. HENLEY said, before the Chairman reported progress, he would beg leave to say that he thought that the mode in which the Votes had been taken that night was very inconvenient, and he trusted that it would not be drawn into a precedent. The notice on the paper of the Votes to be taken was, to say the least of it, very equivocal. It might be read different ways. It might have been supposed either that a Vote was to be taken on account for the several numbers mentioned, or even that the Votes were to be taken throughout upon each particular item, but no one would suppose that a Vote was to be taken on account early in the evening, and that the balance of the same Vote was to be taken at a later hour. Certainly if such a proceeding as that were intended, common candour required that full notice should be given, so that hon. Members might know what they were about. The Committee had actually agreed to balances in cases where the former Votes on account had not been reported, and where there was nothing to show to what they related. Such a hop-step-and-jump method of doing business precluded the possibility, he would not say of discussing the Votes in a proper manner, but even of understanding them. Many hon. Members were no doubt absent, thinking that the Votes would be taken in their regular order. But if that precedent were to be followed, they might as well all stay at home, for it was impossible that they could take part in the discussion for any useful purpose.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to thank the right hon. Gentleman for his well-timed observations, and to express a hope that they would have the desired effect. He had often known Votes passed in an improper manner, but he had never witnessed such a proceeding as that of that evening. Nearly a hundred different Votes had been agreed to, and yet he believed that not one hon. Member knew anything whatever about them, as they were put from the Chair. Such a mode of transacting business was not in conformity with the honour or duty of the House, and he joined with the right hon. Gentleman in hoping that it would not be made a precedent.

MR. PEEL explained that the Votes on account taken that night were not taken on the usual grounds on which Votes on account were asked for; but in consequence of a change which had been introduced during the last year in the mode of voting the Civil Service Estimates. Last Session those Estimates were voted on a principle which rendered it necessary that the Government should have the authority of the House for making certain payments falling due after the 1st of April next. It was by mere accident that the residue of the Votes was taken on the same evening. He had intended, indeed, to ask for Votes on account on the previous day, but the debate on the Irish Salmon Fisheries Bill occupied the whole of the sitting; and when he asked the House to go into Committee of Supply, his Motion was objected to, on the ground that it was then too late to proceed with it. He was consequently obliged to give notice for that night, because it was the last night on which Votes on account could be taken, if the Government were to have funds to meet the payments falling due at the beginning of the following month. With respect to taking the balance of the Votes on the same night, he could not tell at the beginning of the evening what progress the Committee would make, and therefore, in order to make sure of the sums required immediately, it was necessary that he should commence by taking a sum on account in respect of all the Votes.

MR. HENLEY said, that he had not objected to the taking of Votes on account, as he quite understood the necessity for that course under the arrangements of the last year. But when that course was adopted, the House generally understood that another opportunity for discussing and eliciting explanations relative to the particular Vote would be afforded. He never before recollected a Vote on account and what was called the balance being both taken on the same evening. Indeed, he could not tell how the Chairman arrived at the balance when the Vote on account had not been reported. He believed that the first Vote ought to have been reported to the House before the second was proceeded with, and that the two should be treated as distinct Votes. Was the Report to be brought up on the following day in a double shape? That was a matter of no trifling importance. The process that had been adopted, if not irregular, was certainly novel, and he thought it so unusual that he felt it his duty to enter his protest against it.

MR. DILLWYN said, he was glad that the right hon. Gentleman opposite had animadverted on that great irregularity which was creeping into their proceedings, and which, if continued, would put an end to the House's control over the Votes. He trusted that the same right hon. Gentleman would draw up a Resolution calculated to check so evil a practice. He supposed that the temptation to slip through the first and second halves of a Vote on the same evening was so great that the Government could not resist it.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, there could be no doubt that the course pursued that night had been unusual, because he believed that was the first, or nearly the first occasion on which the plan of taking Votes on account for the Civil Service Expenditure had been acted upon. But he could not admit that there was anything in it either dangerous, unconstitutional, or which limited the responsibility of the Government. What was it that his right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury had done? Why, he had first asked for a Vote on account, say, to defray the salaries of the Treasury, and that Vote was agreed to. Then, later in the evening, he had asked for a further sum to make up the amount required for the expenses of the Treasury for the year. The right hon. Gentleman opposite said that the House knew nothing of those Votes on account until they had been reported. But what the Committee had to be satisfied about was that the Government asked neither too much nor too little in the aggregate for the expenses of the Treasury for the year; and if it had assented to the two Votes, he could not see that the Committee had been wanting in its duty, or that the Government had been guilty of any breach of its responsibility to the House. He quite agreed that it was not desirable that this course should often be repeated. He admitted that it was unusual, and might even, perhaps, be inconvenient, but that it was liable to the very severe censure of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, or that in this instance it could lead to any dangerous consequences, he could not for a moment suppose. The two sums correctly made up the amount which the Government intended to ask for the services of the present year; and it was impossible for his right hon. Friend to know in the early part of the evening what progress the Committee might make with the Votes. What he had to do, in the first instance, was to secure a Vote on account to meet the payments falling due in April. The approval awarded by his hon. Friends near him to the observations of the right hon.

Member for Oxfordshire was therefore somewhat precipitate.

MR. HENLEY said, that he had never used the words "dangerous or unconstitutional." He had called the practice "novel," and believed it to be "irregular," and the right hon. Gentleman himself had just applied to it the further epithet of "inconvenient," which was quite correct. So far as he was concerned, he was content to leave the matter on that footing.

COLONEL SYKES said, that when a Vote on account was moved that evening, he had felt satisfied that no division would be taken, and that an opportunity for discussion would be afforded when the balance was asked for on some future occasion. Believing that the usual practice would be adhered to, he had left the House.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow ;
Committee to sit again To-morrow.

TELEGRAPHS BILL.—[BILL 57.] COMMITTEE.

(Progress 23rd March.)

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 13, 14, and 15 were agreed to.

Clause 16 (For Works under or over Land Consent of Owner, &c., requisite).

MR. BLACKBURN said, the clause provided that no company should place its works over or across any lands belonging to the Crown without the previous consent of the proprietor. He wished to propose a verbal Amendment, extending the same rule to lands belonging to private owners.

MR. MILNER GIBSON explained that the clause stated that generally the company should not place posts "on, over, or along" any land except with the consent of the owner, lessee, or occupier. It was only in the saving part of the clause that the power arose of crossing property other than Crown property without the consent of the owner; but it had reference only to wires carried over houses, and not within six feet of them, in which case the consent of the street authorities was to be held sufficient. The proposed alteration would operate as a serious impediment to the extension of town telegraphy.

MR. C. TURNER said, he wished to inquire how a man who lived in a two-story house, which he wished to raise to four stories, or who wished to build a mill on the spot, was to get rid of the wire.

FORTESCUE, Mr. C. S. (Under Secretary for the Colonies) Louth Co.
 Army Estimates—Pay and Allowances, 1283 ;
 —Commissariat Establishment, 1448, 1452, 1454
 Australia and New Zealand—Postal Service, 848
 British North American Intercolonial Railroad, 189
 Ceylon—Military Expenditure, 1660
 Malta—Extradition Ordinance, 968
 New Zealand—Resignation of Sir George Grey, 574
 West Indies, 577

Fortifications at Great Yarmouth
 Question, Sir H. Stracey ; Answer, Sir George Lewis, 643

France—Commercial Treaty with Italy
 Question, Mr. W. E. Forster ; Answer, Mr. Layard, 872

FRENCH, Col. F., Roscommon Co.
 Illegitimate Children (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 345
 Oude—Claims upon, 1393
 Police, Metropolitan and City, 1402
 Private Bills, Fees on, Resolution, 408
 Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), Comm. 1982
 Shannon, River, 1748
 Tobacco Duties, Comm. 1616

Fustian-Cutting Operatives
 Question, Colonel Wilson Patten ; Answer, Sir George Grey, 1393

Galway Contract, The—see Ireland

Game Laws
 Motion for a Select Committee (Mr. W. E. Forster) Mar. 17, 1854 ; Amendt. (Mr. Thompson), 1584 ; Question put, "That the words &c."—A. 157, N. 176, M. 19 ; Words added
 Main Question, as amended, agreed to Gardens in Towns Protection Bill [H.L.]

 (No. 14) (Lord Redesdale)
 l. Read 1st Feb. 23 ; 2nd Feb. 26
 Committee and Rep.^d Feb. 27
 Read 3rd Mar. 2
 c. Read 1st Mar. 5 (Bill 50)
 Read 2nd Mar. 11

GARNETT, Mr. W. J., Lancaster
 Convict System, 222

Gas, Sale of, Act Amendment Bill
 c. Read 1st Mar. 17

GAVIN, Major G., Limerick
 Army Estimates—Commissariat Establishment, 1457 ;—Clothing Establishment, 1460

GEORGE, Mr. J., Wexford Co.
 Births, &c. Registration (Ireland), Leave, 213 ;
 Comm. 548, 552 ; cl. 9, 614
 Illegitimate Children (Ireland), 2R. 266 ;
 Comm. cl. 1, 346 ; cl. 4, 348
 Salmon Fisheries (Ireland) 2R. 248 ; Comm. 1904

GIBSON, Rt. Hon. T. M. (President of the Board of Trade) Ashton-under-Lyne
 Cotton Districts, Distress in the, Commission moved for, 586
 Italy—Commercial Treaty with, 444
 Metropolitan Railways, 1028
 Navy Estimates—Coast Guard Service, &c. 831, 832
 Partnership Law Amendment, 2R. 1887, 1890
 Private Bills, Fees on, 260, 309 ; Resolution, 407
 Private Bill Legislation, Comm. moved for, 468
 Railway Accidents, 261
 Railway Bills, Leave, 175
 Ramsgate Harbour, 1931
 Supply—Board of Trade, 1958
 Telegraphs, Leave, 293 ; Comm. cl. 3, 1648 ;
 cl. 7, 1788, 1789 ; cl. 8, 1790 ; cl. 10, 1791 ;
 cl. 16, 1970, 1971 ; cl. 18, 1972 ; cl. 26, 1974, 1975, 1976, 1977 ; add. cl. 1978, 1979, 1980
 Tobacco Duties, 2R. 957, 958
 Underground Railways, 575

Gilbert, The Convict
 Explanation, Earl Granville, 476

GILPIN, Col. R. T., Bedfordshire
 Militia Estimates, Resolution, 201
 Register of Voters, Comm. 1056

GILPIN, Mr. C. (Secretary to the Poor Law Commissioners) Northampton
 South Eastern Railway, 2R. 402

GLADSTONE, Rt. Hon. W. E. see CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER

GODDARD, Mr. A. L., Cricklade
 Park Lane, South Entrance to, 1332

GOLDSMID, Sir F. H., Reading
 Affirmations, 2R. 1297
 Corrupt Practices at Elections, Leave, 197 ;
 2R. 623 ; Comm. add. cl. 1645
 Telegraphs, Comm. add. cl. 1980

GORE, Mr. W. O., Leitrim Co.
 Census (Ireland), 671
 Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), 2R. 247

GOWER, Hon. E. F. L., Bodmin
 Italy—Commercial Treaty with, 438

GRAHAM, Lord M. W., Herefordshire
 Army Estimates—Pay and Allowances, 1280 ;
 —General Staff, 1432 ;—Barrack Establishment, 1544 ;—Martial Law, 1545 ;—Medical Establishments, 1546 ;—Enrolled Pensioners, &c. 1709
 Ionian Islands—Military Expenditure, 943, 945

GRANARD, Earl of
Address in answer to the Speech, 17

Grants of Arms, see Change of Names

GRANVILLE, Earl (Lord President of the Council)

Brazil—Outrage in, 389
Business, Public, 184, 339
Charitable Endowments, 183
Convict System—Tickets of Leave, 216, 217, 218, 219, 256;—The Convict Gilbert, Explanation, 475; Paper moved for, 558; Return moved for, 559
Courts of Law (Ireland), Returns moved for, 1125
Drainage of Land (Ireland), 2R. 961
Durham University Commission, Address moved, 865, 869
Entailed Estates, Charging of, for Railways, Comm. moved for, 1219
Great Eastern Railway, 2R. 627, 1818, 1822, 1909, 1916
Illegitimate Children (Ireland), 2R. 1124
Loan Fund Board (Ireland), Commission moved for, 1927, 1928
Police, Metropolitan and City, 1598
Prince of Wales—Message from the Queen, Address moved, 372, 374
Prince and Princess of Wales' Annuities, 2R. 864
Prison Discipline, 483, 486, 493
Union Relief Aid Act Continuance, 2R. 1462.

GRAY, Capt. W., Bolton
Volunteer Force—Capitation Grant, 1744

Great Eastern Railway (New Metropolitan Station and Branches)

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^d, Feb. 23, 623; After long Debate, Debate adjourned
Debate resumed Mar. 12, 1815; Amendt. ("this Day Six Months") (Earl of Shaftesbury); Further Debate arising, Debate again adjourned Debate resumed Mar. 26, 1909; After long Debate, on Question, "That 'now' &c." Resolved in the Negative

Greece

Question, Mr. H. Seymour; Answer, Viscount Palmerston, 194
Affairs of, Observations, Visct. Palmerston, Mr. Baillie Cochrane, 1128
Motion for Address for Correspondence (Mr. B. Cochrane) Mar. 18, 1470; After long Debate, Motion withdrawn
Debate on, Mr. Elliot, Explanation, Mr. Gregory, 1608
Scarlett, Mr., and the Greeks, Explanation, Mr. B. Cochrane, 1744
Correspondence respecting the Revolution in, Parl. P. 1, 2, 3, 4

Greenwich Park, Railway through

Question, Viscount Torrington; Answer, The Duke of Somerset, 1741

VOL. CLXIX. [THIRD SERIES]

GREGORY, Mr. W. H., Galway Co.
British North American Intercolonial Railroad, 188
Galway Postal Subsidy, 187; Resolution, 1875
Greece—Affairs of, Papers moved for, 1481; Explanation, 1608

GREGSON, Mr. S., Lancaster
Partnership Law Amendment, 2R. 1836
Union Relief Aid Act Continuance, 2R. 530

GREY, Earl
Address in answer to the Speech, 56
Entailed Estates, Charging of, for Railways, Comm. moved for, 1214
Great Eastern Railway, 2R. 628, 632, 1820, 190
Indian Council, The, 1803
Italy—Affairs of Rome, 377, 378
New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia, Petitions, 1803

GREY, Rt. Hon. Sir G. (Secretary of State for the Home Department) Morpeth

Bakers, Journeymen, Grievances of, 1031
Bermuda, Convict Establishment at, 872
Bills of Exchange, &c. (Metropolis), 2R. 855
Births, &c. Registration (Ireland), Comm. cl. 9, 619; cl. 18, 620, 621
Branch of Privilege—Mr. E. J. Reed, 801
Census (Ireland), 571
Church Rates, 342
Circuit Regulations Commission, 308
College of Arms—Change of Name, Returns moved for, 1579, 1581
Colliery Accidents, 308
Convict Prisons, Report, 968, 1031
Convict System—Tickets of Leave, 222, 263, 572, 1551
Convicts, Sentences on, 1331

Corrupt Practices at Elections, Leave, 194; 2R. 523, Comm. 1002; cl. 2, 1004, 1008, 1009, 1010; cl. 3, 1012; cl. 5, 1012; cl. 8, 1013, 1015, 1016; Amendt. 1629, 1630, 1631; cl. 9, 1633; cl. 11, 1634, 1635, 1639, 1640, 1641, 1642, 1643; add. cl. 1644, 1645, 1646, 1647; Consid. cl. 11, 1894

Crown Lands, Inclosure of, Address moved, 313; Her Majesty's Answer, 728

Diseases Prevention (Metropolis), 2R. 1594

Durham University Commission, 186

Ecclesiastical Courts, 1066

Factory Children, Education of, 2R. 1210

Farquharson, The Convict, 1129

Fires in the Metropolis, 342, 1467

Fustian Cutting Operatives, 1393

Game Laws, Comm. moved for, 1588

Infection in Cabs, 185, 186

Leaves and Drawing Rooms, 873

Licensing Laws, 797

Local Government Act Amendment, 2R. 1981

Lunatics, Confinement of—Hall v. Scoble, 651

Metropolis Turnpike Roads Acts Amendment, Leave, 1039

Metropolitan Railway Schemes, Papers moved for, 612

Municipal Elections, 2R. 1040

Music and Dancing Licences, 221

Poland—English Police in, 1225, 1227, 1229, 1469, 1656

Police, Metropolitan and City, 1404

GREY, Rt. Hon. Sir G.—cont.

Princess Alexandra, Reception of the, 874, 876, 877, 1067, 1068, 1069, 1324
 Prison Ministers, Leave, 460, 467, 967
 Procession and Illumination Accidents, Returns moved for, 1868
 Public-houses, Leave, 1553
 Public Subscriptions, 579
 Rotherham, Disease in, 1395
 Salmon, Exportation of, 724
 Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), Comm. 1984
 Salmon Fisheries (Scotland), 1130
 Security from Violence, Leave, 787; 2R. 1304, 1309
 Transportation and Penal Servitude, Resolution, 1233, 1236
 Transportation Committee, 574
 Volunteers in Hyde Park, 1415

GRIFFITH, Mr. C. D., Devises

Address in answer to the Speech, Report, 166
 Appropriation Bill, 731
 British Territory, Alienation of, 1807
 Corrupt Practices at Elections, Leave, 197; 2R. 526; Comm. cl. 2, 1005; add. cl. 1646; Consid. 1895
 Egypt—Labour in, 577
 Greece—Affairs of, Papers moved for, 1820
 Ionian Islands—Cession of Territory, 227
 Land, Tenure of, 575
 Poland—Arrest of Polish Students, 644;—Affairs of, Address moved, 925;—English Police in, 1469
 Railway Proxies, 409

GROGAN, Sir E., Dublin City

Births, &c. Registration (Ireland), Comm. cl. 9, 615, 619
 Growing Crops, Seizure of, (Ireland), 1031
 Marriages (Ireland), 2R. 1120
 Phoenix Park (Dublin), 497
 Poor Relief (Ireland), 1328
 Registration of Assurances, 796
 Telegraphs, Comm. add. cl. 1978
 Tobacco Duties, 2R. 989
 Vaccination (Ireland), 2R. 1793

HADFIELD, Mr. G., Sheffield

Adjournment of the House, 726
 Appropriation of Supplies, Resolution, Amendt. 1863
 Births, &c. Registration (Ireland), Comm. 549
 Corrupt Practices at Elections, Leave, 197
 Fire Insurance Duty, 186
 Prince of Wales' Marriage Day, 725, 727
 Private Bills, Fees on, Resolution, 406
 Private Bill Legislation, Comm. moved for, Instruction, 468
 Qualification for Offices Abolition, 2R. 469; 3R. 1043
 Railway Bills, Leave, 174
 Security from Violence, 2R. Amendt. 1305
 Supply—Houses of Parliament, 1957
 Transportation and Penal Servitude, Resolution, 1246

HALIBURTON, Mr. T. C., Launceston

Army Estimates—Works, &c. at Home and Abroad, 1778

HAMILTON, Rt. Hon. Lord C., Tyrone Co.

Illegitimate Children (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 346
 Poor Law (Patrick Bourke), Paper moved for, 459
 Public Accounts, Committee on, Nomination of Comm. 717
 Vaccination (Ireland), 2R. 1793

HAMILTON, Major W. F., Linlithgowshire

Prison Ministers, Leave, 464

HANKEY, Mr. T., Peterborough

Budget, The, 1238
 Fires in the Metropolis, 342
 New South Wales—Export of Gold, 640
 Prince and Princess of Wales' Annuities, 2R. 647
 Thames Embankment (North Side) Leave, 357

HANMER, Sir J., Flint, &c.

Address in answer to the Speech, 114
 Navy Estimates—Naval Stores, 853

Harbours of Refuge

Question, Lord Ravensworth; Answer, The Duke of Somerset, 243

HARDINGE, Viscount

Volunteer Commission, 144

HARDWICKE, Earl of

Brazil—Relations with, 1213
 Convict System—Tickets of Leave, 220
 Edinburgh Castle—Gunpowder Store, 1550
 Galway Packet Contract, 1125, 1127, 1129
 Great Eastern Railway, 2R. 631
 Naval Coast Volunteers Act Amendment, 2R. 962
 Princess Alexandra, Reception of, 1223

HARDY, Mr. G., Leominster

Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 2, 1008, 1009; cl. 8, 1014; cl. 9, Amendt. 1634; cl. 11, 1640; add. cl. 1644
 Liverpool Licensing, 2R. 397
 Metropolis Turnpike Roads Acts Amendment, Leave, 1039, 1040
 Municipal Elections, 2R. Amendt. 1040

Hares (Ireland) Bill* [Bill 51]

(Mr. Hassard, Mr. D. Fortescue)

c. Read 1st Mar. 5; 2nd Mar. 12

Committee and Rep. * Mar. 16

Considered as amended * Mar. 18

Read 3rd Mar. 19

l. Read 1st Mar. 20

(No. 52)

Haslar Hospital

Explanation, Sir John Hay, 818

HASSARD, Mr. M. D., Waterford City

Births, &c. Registration (Ireland), Comm. cl. 9, 617; cl. 28, Amendt. 622
 Game Laws (Ireland), 674
 Illegitimate Children (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 344, 346
 Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), 2R. 242; Comm. Adj. moved, 1063, 1908

HAY, Sir J. C. D., Wakefield
 Haaslar Hospital, Explanation, 818
 Naval Prize Money, 1065
 Navy Estimates—Coast Guard Service, &c.
 830 ;—Artificers, &c. Abroad, 840 ;—Naval Stores, 845, 849
 Navy—Promotion and Retirement, Address moved, 731, 774, 784 ;—Wooden Frames for Iron Ships, Resolution, 1372
 Public Subscriptions, 571

HEADLAM, Rt. Hon. T. E. (Judge Advocate General) Newcastle-upon-Tyne
 Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1274

HENLEY, Lord, Northampton
 Corrupt Practices at Elections, 2R. 514 ; Comm.
cl. 2, 1007

HENLEY, Rt. Hon. J. W., Oxfordshire
 Affirmations, 2R. 1298
 Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 11,
 1640, 1642
 Crown Lands, Inclosure of, Address moved,
 316
 Diseases Prevention (Metropolis), 2R. 1593
 Italy—Extradition Treaty with, 727
 Liverpool Licensing, 2R. 398
 Mutiny, Comm. 1649
 Navy—Wooden Frames for Iron Ships, Resolution, 1387
 Post Office Savings Banks, Comm. Resolution,
 328 ; cl. 1, 1116 ; add. cl. 1117, 1118
 Salmon Fisheries (Scotland), 1129
 Supply, 1967, 1968, 1970
 Telegraphs, Comm. cl. 3, 1648 ; cl. 7, 1788,
 1789 ; cl. 10, 1791 ; cl. 16, 1971 ; cl. 18,
 1972 ; cl. 26, Amendt. 1974, 1976, 1978
 Thames Conservancy, 2R. 405
 Thames Embankment (North Side), Leave, 354
 Transportation and Penal Servitude, Resolution, 1243
 Union Relief Aid Act Continuance, Comm.
add. cl. 978

HENNESSY, Mr. J. P., King's Co.
 Address in answer to the Speech, 115
 Barristers (Ireland), 798
 Births, &c. Registration (Ireland), Comm. 555 ;
cl. 9, 616, 618, 619 ; cl. 23, 621
 Court of Probate, Officers of the, 1395
 Drainage of Land (Ireland), Leave, 177
 Illegitimate Children (Ireland), Leave, 224 ;
 2R. 266
 Italy—Commercial Treaty with, 427, 432, 435
 Mutiny, Comm. cl. 23, Amendt. 1649
 Poland—State of, 192, 226 ;—Russian and Prussian Convention, 644 ;—Affairs of, Address moved, 879, 893, 943 ;—English Police in, 1225, 1227, 1329, 1469, 1656 ;—Case of M.
 Abicht, 1653 ;—Treaty of Vienna, 1745
 Poor Law (Patrick Bourke), Paper moved for, 459
 Prison Ministers, Leave, 467
 Public Accounts, Committee on, Nominations of Comm. Amendt. 715 ; Adj. moved, 716
 Secretary at War, Office of, Abolition, 2R.
 1981

HERBERT, Rt. Hon. H. A., Kerry Co.
 Poor Law (Patrick Bourke), Paper moved for, 457
 Poor Removal, 168
 Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), 2R. 246

HEYGATE, Sir W. F., Londonderry Co.
 Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), Comm. 1060

HIBBERT, Mr. J. T., Oldham
 Address in answer to the Speech, Report, 162
 Emigration from the Cotton Districts, 1089
 Poor Laws, Administration of the, 1066
 Security from Violence, 2R. 1307
 Union Relief Aid Act Continuance, Leave, 281
 2R. 537 ; Comm. add. cl. 971

HODGSON, Mr. R., Tynemouth
 Private Bills, Fees on, 258 ; Resolution, 405, 408
 Regent Circus Railway, 2R. 1025
 Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), 2R. 243

HOPWOOD, Mr. J. T., Clitheroe
 Church Rates, 342
 Prince and Princess of Wales' Annuities, 2R.
 647
 United States—French Mediation, 728

HORSFALL, Mr. T. B., Liverpool
 Galway Contract, The, Resolution, 1673
 Inland Revenue and Customs Establishments,
 Comm. 1211
 Liverpool Licensing, 2R. 395
 Public-houses, Leave, 1553
 Tobacco Duties, 2R. 992

HOTHAM, Lord, Yorkshire, E. R.
 Army Estimates—Administration of the Army, 1785
 Telegraphs, Comm. cl. 7, 1789
 Volunteer Commission, Report, 221
 Volunteers in Hyde Park, 1411

HOWARD, Rt. Hon. Lord E. G. F., Arundel
 Union Relief Aid Act Continuance, 2R. 535 ;
 Comm. add. cl. 972

HOWES, Mr. E., Norfolk, E.
 Register of Votes, Comm. Amendt. 1055 ; cl. 1, Amendt. 1057

HUBBARD, Mr. J. G., Buckingham
 Income Tax, Resolution, 1817, 1847
 Post Office Savings Banks, Comm. 1018 ; 3R.
 1588

HUMBERSTON, Mr. P. S., Chester
 Union Relief Aid Act Continuance, 2R. 534 ;
 Comm. add. cl. 976

HUNT, Mr. G. W., Northamptonshire, N.
 Brazil—Dispute with, 642, 643
 Constabulary Horses, 1809
 Corrupt Practices at Elections, Leave, 195 ;
 Comm. cl. 5, 1012 ; cl. 8, 1015 ; Amendt.
 1631, 1632, 1641 ; add. cl. 1645, 1646
 Diseases Prevention (Metropolis), 2R. 1595

HUTT, Rt. Hon. W. (Paymaster of the Forces and Vice President of the Board of Trade) Gateshead Thames Conservancy, Comm. moved for, 1649

Hyde Park, Carriage Road through Question, Visct. Enfield; Answer, Mr. Cowper, 679

Illegitimate Children (Ireland) Bill (Bill 13) (Sir R. Peel, Mr. Bruce)

c. Read 1^o Feb. 10, 223

Second Reading moved (Sir R. Peel); After Debate, agreed to, Feb. 12, 260; Bill read 2^o

Considered in Committee, Feb. 16, 344

cl. 4, Amendt. (Lord J. Browne), withdrawn, 348; Bill reported

Considered as amended * Feb. 17

Re-Committal on cl. 4 * Feb. 19

Read 3^o * Feb. 20

i. Read 1^o * Feb. 23

(No. 17)

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a (Duke of Newcastle) Mar. 6, 1121; Amendt. ("this Day Six Months") (Visct. Lifford), 1122; After Debate, Amendt. withdrawn

Bill read 2^a, and referred to a Select Committee

Committee:—Ld. Chancellor, D. Marlborough, D. Newcastle, Ld. Steward, V. Lifford, V. Hawarden, L. Boyle, L. Ponsonby, L. Somerhill, L. Stanley of Alderley, L. Montague of Brandon, L. Chelmsford

Poor Relief (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill referred to the same Committee

Report of Select Comm. * Mar. 19; Parl. P. 49; Bill as amended No. 50

Committee * Mar. 23; Rep. * Mar. 24

Inclosure Bill [Bill 58]

(Mr. Bruce, Sir G. Grey)

c. Read 1^o * Mar. 12; 2^o * Mar. 19

Committee and Rep. * Mar. 24

Read 3^o * Mar. 25

i. Read 1^o * Mar. 26

(No. 58)

Income Tax

Resolution (Mr. Hubbard) Mar. 24, 1817; After long Debate, Question put—A. 70, N. 118, M. 48

India

Bengal Army, Question, Mr. Kinnaird; Answer, Sir C. Wood, 189

Burmese Prize Money, Question, Col. North; Answer, Sir C. Wood, 797

Book Post to India and China, Question, Col. Sykes; Answer, Mr. Peel, 798

Cholera in the Punjab, Question, Sir W. Miles; Answer, Sir C. Wood, 1129

Delhi Prize Money, Question, Col. Smyth; Answer, Sir G. Lewis, 261;—Question, Mr. MacEvoy; Answer, Sir C. Wood, 1394

Indian Army, Petitions of Indian Officers (The Earl of Ellenborough), 294;—Papers relating to, Parl. P. 80

Indian Council, The, Question, Lord Lyveden; Answer, The Duke of Argyll—Debate thereon, 1799

India Medical Service, Question, Mr. Remington Mills; Answer, Sir C. Wood, 1355

India—cont.

Madras Irrigation Company, Question, Mr. Smollett; Answer, Sir C. Wood, 341

Memorandum of Dinker Rao, Question, Mr. Liddell; Answer, Sir C. Wood, 365

Nawab, The, of the Carnatic, Amendt. on Comm. of Supply Feb. 26 (Mr. H. Baillie), 802; After Debate, Question put, "That the words &c."—A. 104, N. 24, M. 80, 818

Nawab, The, of the Carnatic, Question, Mr. H. Baillie; Answer, Sir C. Wood, 1327

North Western Provinces, Government of the, Question, Mr. Vansittart; Answer, Sir C. Wood, 1808

Officers of the East India Company's Army, Question, Capt. Jervis; Answer, Sir C. Wood, 1465

Oude, State of, Question, Mr. Torrens; Answer, Sir C. Wood, 966;—Claims upon, Question, Col. French; Answer, Sir C. Wood, 1393

Sedashegur, The Port of, Question, Lord Stanley; Answer, Sir C. Wood, 189;—Correspondence relating to, Parl. P. 81

INGHAM, Mr. R., South Shields

Affirmations, 2R. 1301

Inland Revenue and Customs Departments

Select Committee appointed Feb. 17; nominated March 2:—Mr. Horsfall, Mr. Peel, Mr. Hankey, Sir H. Willoughby, Mr. E. P. Bouverie, Mr. C. Turner, Mr. M. Gibson, Lord R. Montagu, Mr. W. Forster, Sir S. Northcote, Mr. Hennessey, Mr. Liddell, Mr. Laird, and Sir W. Hayter

Sir E. Grogan added, March 5

Mr. Gibson and Mr. Peel discharged; Mr. Cardwell and Mr. Bagwell added, March 6, 1211

Innkeepers' Liability (No. 1) Bill [Bill 18]

(Mr. W. Martin, Mr. Grant Duff, Mr. Buns)

c. Read 1^o * Feb. 13, 338

Innkeepers' Liability (No. 2) Bill [Bill 43]

(Mr. Butt, Dr. Brady)

c. Read 1^o * Feb. 27

Ionian Islands, The

Harbour in the Adriatic, Question, Sir F. Smith, 683; Answer, Lord C. Paget, 666

Military Expenditure, Observations, Lord W. Graham; Reply, Sir G. Lewis, 943

Cession of Territory, Question, Mr. Darby Griffith, 227; Answer, Visct. Palmerston, 230;—Question, Mr. Roebuck; Answer, Visct. Palmerston, 412

Parl. P.—Greece, Correspondence, No. 3

Ireland

Arterial Drainage in, Question, Mr. Bagwell; Answer, Mr. Peel, 1609

Barriers (Ireland) Bill, Question, The Solicitor General; Answer, Mr. Hennessey, 798

Bourke, Patrick, Case of, Question, Lord J. Browne; Answer, Mr. Villiers, 795; Parl. P. 75, 245

Brophy, Mary, Case of, Question, Mr. Vance; Answer, Mr. Villiers, 1651; Parl. P. 104

Braddell, Mr., Murder of, Observations, Mr. Whiteside, Mr. Bagwell; Reply, Sir R. Peel, 1692, 1695

[cont.]

[cont.]

Ireland—cont.

Census, Irish, Question, Mr. W. O. Gore; Answer, Sir G. Grey, 571

Convict Supervision, Dublin, Paper moved for (Earl of Carnarvon), 557; Parl. P. 45

Courts of Law (Ireland)—Judicial Statistics, Address for Returns (Marquess of Clanricarde) Mar. 6, 1125; Parl. P.

Distress in Ireland, Observations, Mr. Maguire; Reply, Sir R. Peel, 591

Drainage (Ireland) [Stamps], considered in Committee Feb. 13; Resolution, Chancellor of the Exchequer agreed to, 338

Fairs and Markets in Ireland, Question, Mr. Blake; Answer, Sir R. Peel, 1328

Federal Recruiting in Ireland, Question, Lord H. Thynne; Answer, Sir R. Peel, 1930

Fisheries, Irish Board of, Question, Mr. Blake; Answer, Mr. Peel, 1028

Galway Packet Contract, Question, The Earl of Harwicke; Answer, Lord Stanley of Alderley, 1125;

Question, Mr. Baxter; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, 575;—Amendt. on Comm. of Supply (March 20)—Motion (Mr. Baxter), 1661; After long Debate, Question put, "That the words" &c.—A. 109, N. 46, M. 63, 1691

Galway Packet Subsidy, Question, Mr. Gregory; Answer, Visct. Palmerston, 187;

Parl. Papers—Commons

Papers relating to . . . 60

First Return . . . 60-I

Letters . . . 68, 130

Game Laws (Ireland), Question, Mr. Hlassard; Answer, Sir R. Peel, 574

Loan Fund Board (Ireland), Motion for an Address for a Royal Commission (The Earl of Leitrim) Mar. 26, 1927; on Question, Resolved in the Negative

Marriage Law (Ireland), Observations, Mr. Dawson, 1657

O'Connor, Michael, Case of, Observations, Mr. O'Hara; Reply, Sir Robert Peel, 1694

Outdoor Relief (Ireland), Question, Mr. Langan; Answer, Sir Robert Peel, 725

Phœnix Park (Dublin), Question, Sir Edward Grogan; Answer, Mr. Peel, 497

Political Demonstrations in Ireland, Questions, Mr. Whalley; Answer, Sir Robert Peel; Debate thereon, 1931

Riots at Cork, Question, Mr. Vance; Answer, Sir Robert Peel, 1552

Seizure of Growing Crops in Ireland, Question, Sir Edward Grogan; Answer, Sir R. Peel, 1031

Shannon, River, Question, Colonel French; Answer, Mr. Peel, 1743

Supply—Lord Lieutenant—Chief Secretary—Lunatic Asylums—Public Works, 1960;—

Agricultural and Emigration Statistics, 1961;—Hospitals and Infirmarys—Concordatum Fund—Non-Conforming, &c. Ministers [A. 53, N. 26, M. 27], 1966

Tenure of Land (Ireland), Question, Mr. Maguire; Answer, Sir R. Peel, 308

See—

Admiralty Court (Ireland) Bill

Assurances Registration (Ireland) Bill

Barristers (Ireland) Bill

Births, &c. Registration (Ireland) Bill

Drainage of Land (Ireland) Bill

Illegitimate Children (Ireland) Bill

[cont.]

Ireland—cont.

Judgments Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill

Marriages (Ireland) Bill

Marriages Registration (Ireland) Bill

Redemption of Rents (Ireland) Bill

Roman Catholic Marriages Registration (Ireland) Bill

Salmon Fisheries (Ireland) Bill

Vaccination (Ireland) Bill

Italy

Affairs of Rome, Observations, Question, The Marquess of Normanby; Answer, Earl Russell, 874, 790;—Explanation, Marquess of Normanby, 474

Observations, Mr. Stirling; Reply, Mr. Layard, 1416, 1421

Commercial Treaty with Italy, Observations, Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald, 415

Despatches, The Italian, Question, The Marquess of Normanby; Answer, Earl Russell, 1064

Extradition Treaty with Italy, Question, Sir G. Bowyer; Answer, Mr. Layard, 726

Southern Italy, Condition of, Question, Mr. C. Bentinck; Answer, Mr. Layard, 1332

Parl. Papers—Commons

Rome . . . Nos. [3074] [3080]

Brigandage . . . No. [3078]

Naples, Commerce with No. [3086]

JACKSON, Mr. W., Newcastle-under-Lyme

Army Estimates—Volunteers, 1708

Malt Duty, 2R. 545

Navy Estimates—New Works, 1110

Navy—Wooden Frames for Iron Ships, Resolution, 1363

Partnership Law Amendment, 2R. 1893

Regent Circus Railway, 2R. 1024

Telegraphs, Comm. cl. 6, Amendt. 1649

JERVIS, Capt. H. J. W., Harwich

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1268

Bermuda, Convict Establishment at, 872

Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 2, 1004

East India Company's Army, Officers of the, 1465, 1466

Finsbury Circus, 411, 412

Marriages (Ireland), 2R. 1120

JERVOISE, Sir J. C., Hampshire, S.

Treasure Trove, 1069

Japan, Affairs of

Observations, Mr. H. Seymour; Reply, Mr. Layard, 1419, 1422

Correspondence respecting, Parl. P. [3079]

Journals, Sub-Committee for the

Appointed Feb. 5

Judgments, &c. Law Amendment Bill

[Bill 5]

(Mr. Hadfield, Mr. L. King, Mr. Powell)

c. Read 1^o Feb. 6

Judgments Law Amendment (Ireland) Bill

[Bill 71]

(Mr. Whiteside, Mr. George)

c. Read 1^o Mar. 19

Jurors' Remuneration Bill [Bill 36]

(Mr. Ayrton, Sir. F. Kelly)

c. Read 1^o Feb. 24, 788KELLY, Sir FitzRoy, Suffolk, E.

Bankruptcy Act (1861), 223

Benchers' Jurisdiction and Authority, Leave, 225

Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 3, 1012; cl. 6, 1013; cl. 8, 1016, 1630, 1631;

cl. 11, 1634, 1641

KENDALL, Mr. N., Cornwall, E.

Prince of Wales—Message from the Queen.

Comm. Resolution, 509

KENNAED, Mr. R. W., Newport, Isle of Wight

India—Bengal Army, 189

KING, Hon. P. J. L., Surrey, E.

Register of Voters, Comm. 1055, 1056; cl. 1, 1057

KINNAIRD, Hon. A. F., Perth

Abbeokuta, Vice Consul at, 668

Army Estimates—Pay and Allowances, 1279

Cast Iron Ordnance, 1467

Diplomatic Service, Resolution, 1946

Factory Children, Education of, 2R. 1210

Municipal Elections, 2R. 1041

Navy Estimates—Naval Stores, 649

Prison Ministers, 967

Public Accounts, Committee on, Nomination of Comm. 716

Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms (House of Commons)

Seasonal Committee appointed, Feb. 9

Members:—Mr. G. W. P. Bentinck, Mr. W.

Cubitt, Mr. Dalglish, Col. French, Lord R. Mon-tagu, Mr. Onslow, Col. White

KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, Mr. E. H. (Lord of the Treasury) Sandwich

South Eastern Railway, 2R. 403

KNIGHTLEY, Mr. R., Northamptonshire, N.

Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 11, 1639, 1643

KNOX, Lt.-Col. B. W., Marlow

Army Estimates—Clothing Establishment, 1459

South Eastern Railway, 2R. 404

LAIRD, Mr. J., Birkenhead

Armstrong, Sir W., Resignation of, 571

Brazil—Outrage in, 146;—Mr. Consul Vereker, 643

Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, 669;—Naval Establishments at Home, 834;—Artificers,

&c. at Home, 836, 837, 838;—Naval Stores, 843, 846;—New Works, 1113

Navy—Wooden Frames for Iron Ships, Resolution, 1358

Obsolete Vessels of War, 1108

Portsmouth Dockyard, 1652

"Royal Oak" and "Royal Sovereign," 408

Land, Tenure of

Question, Mr. D. Griffith; Answer, Sir R. Peel, 576

LANIGAN, Mr. J. Cashel

Outdoor Relief (Ireland), 739

LAWSON, Mr. W., Carlisle

Licensing Laws, 797

Music and Dancing Licences, 221

LAYARD, Mr. A. H. (Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs) Southwark

Abbeokuta, Vice Consul at, 667

Brazil—Outrage in, 147, 148, 264;—Mr. Consul

Vereker, 643, 648;—Relations with, Resolution, 1176

China—British Officers in, 187;—Aid from Russia, 343;—Colonel Burgevine's Corps, 1420, 1756

Coolie Immigration into the Island of Réunion, Papers moved for, 1813

Danish Papers, 412

Diplomatic Service, Resolution, 1939

Equipment of Vessels for the Confederate States, 968

Greece—Affairs of, Papers moved for, 1494, 1506, 1507, 1518

Italy—Commercial Treaty with, 423, 430;—

Extradition Treaty with, 726, 727;—Commercial Treaty with France, 872;—Condition of the Southern portion, 1332;—Affairs of Rome, 1421, 1425

Japan—Affairs of, 1423

Poland—Russian and Prussian Convention, 644

St. Juan, Island of, 1607

Smyrna, Poll Tax at, 1326, 1327

Leases and Sales of Settled Estates Act Amendment Bill [H.L.] (No. 42)

(The Lord Chancellor)

l. Read 1^o Mar. 16LEATHAM, Mr. E. A., Huddersfield

Income Tax, Resolution, 1817

LEFROY, Mr. A., Dublin University

Births, &c. Registration (Ireland), Comm. 556

LEIGHTON, Sir B., Salop, S.

Register of Voters, Comm. 1056

Union Relief Aid Act Continuance, Leave, 283

LEITRIM, Earl of

Births and Deaths Registration (Ireland),

Comm. 1796

Loan Fund Board (Ireland), Commission moved for, 1927, 1928

LENNOX, Lord G. C. H. G., Chichester

British Museum Estimates, 1655

Navy Estimates—New Works, 1111, 1113

Levees and Drawing Rooms, The Royal

Question, Mr. Sturt, 793;—Question, Sir M.

Farquhar; Answer, Sir G. Grey, 873

LEWIS, Right Hon. Sir G. C. (Secretary of State for War) Radnor, &c.

Armstrong and Whitworth Guns, 1395

Armstrong, Sir W.. Resignation of, 571

Army Clothing, 1701

Army Promotion, 262 ;—Staff Appointments, 1229 ;—Accounts of Expenditure, 1253, 1254 ;—Clothing Factory, Pimlico, 1606 ;—Command Pay in Cavalry Regiments, 1754

Army Estimates, 724 ;—Land Forces, 1254, 1264, 1266, 1267, 1268, 1269, 1271 ;—Pay and Allowances, 1276, 1278, 1279, 1280, 1281, 1282, 1283, 1284 ;—General Staff, 1429, 1432, 1433, 1434, 1440, 1441, 1445 ;—Commissariat Establishment, 1446, 1456 ;—Clothing Establishment, 1457, 1458, 1460 ;—Barrack Establishment, 1545 ;—Martial Law, 1546 ;—Medical Establishments, ib. ;—Disembodied Militia, 1547 ;—Volunteers, 1703, 1708 ;—Enrolled Pensioners, &c. 1709 ;—Manufacturing Departments, ib., 1713, 1761, 1763, 1769 ;—Warlike Stores, 1770 ;—Works, &c. at Home and Abroad, 1775, 1780 ;—Military Education, 1781 ;—Surveys, &c. 1789 ;—Miscellaneous Services, ib. ;—Administration of the Army, 1783, 1784, 1785 ;—Superannuation Allowances, 1786 ;—Report, Volunteers, 1787

Cape of Good Hope—German Settlers at, 1392, 1393

Cast Iron Ordnance, 1467

Charteris, Lieut. Col.—Retirement on Half Pay, 1606, 1808

China—Prize Money, 966

Delhi Prize Money, 262

Fortifications at Great Yarmouth, 643

Illegitimate Children (Ireland), Comm. cl. 2, 346

Ionian Islands—Military Expenditure, 944, 945, 946

Lilley, Sergeant Major, Case of, 1744

Militia Estimates, Resolution, 198, 202

Mutiny, Comm. 1619

Secretary at War, Office of, Abolition, 2R. 1980

Stoppage of Officers' Pay for Forage, Address moved, 1542, 1543

Supply, 1969

Volunteer Act, 1227

Volunteer Commission, Report, 221

Volunteers in Hyde Park, 1410

LEWIS, Mr. J. H., Marylebone

Army—Clothing Factory, Pimlico, 1605

Army Estimates—Volunteers, 1705

Metropolitan Railway Schemes, Papers moved for, 606

Private Bills—Standing Order 120, 722

Procession and Illumination Accidents, Returns moved for, 1865

Regent Circus Railway, 2R. Amendment, 1021

Thames Embankment (North Side), Leave, 361

Volunteer Force—The Capitation Grant to, 1744

Licensing Laws, The

Question, Mr. Lawson ; Answer, Sir G. Grey, 797

LIDDELL, Hon. G. H., Northumberland, S.

India—Memorandum of Dinker Rao, 265

Italy—Commercial Treaty with, 487

Navy Estimates—Coast Guard Service, &c. 828, 830 ;—Naval Stores, 849

LIFFORD, Viscount

Drainage of Land (Ireland), 2R. 960, 961

East Gloucestershire Railway, 2R. 718, 719

Illegitimate Children (Ireland), 2R. Amendt. 1122, 1124

Poor Relief (Ireland) Act Amendment, 2R. 1125

Lilley, Sergeant Major, of the Inniskillen Dragoons

Question, Captain Archdall ; Answer, Sir G. Lewis, 1743

LINDSAY, Hon. Major Gen. J., Wigan

Army Estimates—Pay and Allowances, 1281 ;—Barrack Establishment, 1544 ;—Administration of the Army, 1784

Army Promotion, 262

Distinguished Service Colonels, 1950

Union Relief Aid Act Continuance, 2R. 532

LINDSAY, Mr. W. S., Sunderland

Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, 700 ;—Admiralty Office, 818, 825 ;—Coast Guard Service, 830, 831 ;—Naval Establishments at Home, 834 ;—Artificers, &c. Abroad, 836 ;—Adj. moved, 837, 839 ;—Naval Stores, 842, 843 ; Amendt. 847 ;—New Works, 1109, 1113

Navy—Wooden Frames for Iron Ships, Resolution, 1333

Obsolete Vessels of War, 1091

Transport Service, 657

Liverpool Licensing BillSecond Reading moved Feb. 17 ; Amendt. "upon this day six months" (Lord Fermoy) ; Question put, "That the word 'now' &c."—A. 108, N. 124, M. 16 ; Words added ; Bill put off, 394LLANOVER, Lord

Princess Alexandra, Reception of the, 1223

Volunteer Commission, Report, 143

Local Government Act (1858) Amendment Bill [Bill 69]

(Sir G. Grey, Mr. Bruce)

c. Read 1^o Mar. 19Read 2^o, after short Debate, Mar. 26, 1981LOCKE, Mr. J., *Southwark

Address in answer to the Speech, Report, 154

Affirmations, 2R. 1299

Crown Lands, Inclosure of, Address moved, 315

Municipal Elections, 2R. 1041

Princess Alexandra, Reception of the, 876, 877

Private Bills—Standing Order 120, 722

Queen's Prison, Southwark, 341

Regent Circus Railway, 2R. 1025

Register of Voters, Comm. 1056

Telegraphs, Comm. cl. 16, 1971 ; cl. 26, 1973

Thames Conservancy, 2R. 495

LOCKE, Mr. J.—cont.

Thames Embankment (North Side), Leave, 352
Tobacco Duties, Comm. Resolution, 834; 2R. 955

LONDON, Bishop of

Augmentation of Benefices, 1R. 1926

London Coal and Wine Duties

Acts considered in Committee * Feb. 20; Resolution

London Coal and Wine Duties Bill [Bill 27]

(Mr. Massey, Mr. Couper, Mr. Peel)
c. Read 1^o * Feb. 20; 2^o * Mar. 11

LONGFIELD, Mr. R., Mallow

Births, &c. Registration (Ireland), Comm. cl. 9, 616; cl. 18, 820

Courts of Law Commission (England and Ireland), 262

Illegitimate Children (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 345

Marriages (Ireland), 2R. 1120

St. Juan, Island of, 1607

Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), 2R. 240; Comm. 1898

Lords Commissioners' Speech, Feb. 5

See Parliament

LOVAIN, Lord, Northumberland, N.

Army Estimates—Pay and Allowances, 128;—Clothing Establishment, 1459, 1461;—Martial Law, 1845;—Disembodied Militia, Adj. moved, 1547;—Volunteers, Amendt. 1704, 1705, 1708;—Manufacturing Departments, 1712

Navy Estimates—Artificers, &c. at Home, 839

Navy—Wooden Frames for Iron Ships, Resolution, 1356

Security from Violence, 2R. 1305

LOWE, Right Hon. R. (Vice President of the Committee of the Privy Council for Education) Calne

Acting Teachers, Examination of, 1228

LUCAN, Earl of

Drainage of Land (Ireland), 2R. 961

Lunatics, Confinement of—Hall v. Semple

Question, Mr. Butt; Answer, Sir G. Grey, 661

LYALL, Mr. G., Whitshaven

Ceylon—Military Expenditure, 1669

LYGON, Hon. F., Tewkesbury

Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. 1001; cl. 2, 1004; cl. 8, Amendt. 1013, 1014, 1016, 1630, 1632; cl. 9, Amendt. 1638; cl. 11, 1634, 1640

Navy Estimates—Coast Guard Service, &c. 830

Post Office Savings Banks, 2R. 854

South Eastern Railway, 2R. 408

Telegraphs, Comm. add. cl. 1979

LYVEDEN, Lord

Indian Council, The, 1797

MCCANN, Mr. J., Drogheda

Births, &c. Registration (Ireland), Comm.

Marriages Registration (Ireland), Leave, 85

Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), Comm. 1061

MACDONOGH, Mr. F., Sligo Bo.

Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), Comm. 1901

MACEVY, Mr. E., Meath Co.

Army Estimates—Clothing Establishment, 1459

Delhi Prize Money, 1394

MCMAHON, Mr. P., Wexford Co.

Births, &c. Registration (Ireland), Leave, 211;

Comm. 551; cl. 9, Amendt. 614, 619; cl. 21, 621; cl. 30, 622; Consid. cl. 23, 1017

Circuits, Arrangement of the, 496

Corrupt Practices at Elections, 2R. 514

Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), Leave, 178; 2R.

234, 248, 643, 725; Comm. 1063, 1983

MAGUIRE, Mr. J. F., Dungarvan

Address in answer to the Speech, 110

Australia and New Zealand—Postal Service, 343

Births, &c. Registration (Ireland), Leave, 211;

Comm. 550; cl. 9, 617; Consid. cl. 23, 1017

Distress in Ireland, 591, 604

Land Tenure (Ireland), 308

Marriages Registration (Ireland), Leave, 856

Poland—Affairs of, Address moved, 929

Prison Ministers, Leave, 465

Public Accounts, Committee on, Nomination of Comm. 716

Tobacco Duties, 2R. 714, 956

MALINS, Mr. R., Wallingford

Crown Lands, Inclosure of, Address moved, 317

Partnership Law Amendment, 2R. 1838

Regent Circus Railway, 2R. 1027

Mail Contracts

Cape, Question, Sir M. Peto; Answer, Mr. Peel, 1326

Galway Packet Contract, Question, The Earl of Hardwicke; Answer, Lord Stanley of Alderley, 1125;

Question, Mr. Baxter; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, 575;—Amendt. on Comm. of Supply (March 20)—Motion (Mr. Baxter), 1661; After long Debate, Question put, "That the words &c."—A. 109, N. 46, M. 63; 1691

Galway Packet Subsidy, Question, Mr. Gregory; Answer, Visct. Palmerston, 187;

Ostend and Calais, Question, Mr. Berkeley; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, 1331

Parl Papers—Commons

Dover and Calais . . . 266, 291

Galway Subsidy 60, 60-I, 68, 130

MALMESBURY, Earl of

Address in answer to the Speech, 51, 55
Brazil—Relations with, 1212
Convict System—Tickets of Leave, 256
Edinburgh Castle—Gunpowder Store, 1550
Great Eastern Railway, 2R. 1321, 1323, 1916
Poland—Insurrection in, 569
Princess Alexandra, Reception of the, 1223
Prison Discipline, 486
Salmon Exportation, 2R. 1464; Rep., cl. 3, 1741

Malt Duty Bill [Bill 20]

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Peel)

- c. Read 1^o Feb. 16, 363
Read 2^o, after Debate, Feb. 19, 542
Committee and Rep.* Feb. 26
Considered in Committee Mar. 5, 1115
cl. 1 amended: Bill reported
Considered as amended* Mar. 6
Read 3^o* Mar. 9
l. Read 1^o* (The Lord President) Mar. 12
Read 2^o*, and Committee negatived, Mar. 13
Read 3^o* Mar. 16
Royal Assent Mar. 27 [26 & 27 Vict., c. 3]
Parl. Papers—Commons Bill 20
As amended in Comm. (Feb. 26) Bill 37
Lords No. 38

Malta, Extradition Ordinances in Question, Sir G. Bowyer; Answer, Mr. C. Fortescue, 968; Parl. P. [3118]

MANNERS, Right Hon. Lord J. J. R., Leicestershire, N.

Greece—Affairs of, Papers moved for, 1504, 1506, 1507
Municipal Elections, 2R. 1040
Regent Circus Railway, 2R. 1023

Marine Mutiny Bill,

(Mr. Massey, Lord C. Paget, Mr. Whitbread)

- c. Ordered Feb. 24
Read 1^o* Mar. 12; 2^o* Mar. 19
Considered in Committee* Mar. 20 (a.p.)
Considered in Committee Mar. 23, 1787; Bill reported
Read 3^o* Mar. 24
l. Read 1^o* (The Duke of Somerset) Mar. 26

MARLBOROUGH, Duke of

Augmentation of Benefices, 1R. 1926
Convict System—Tickets of Leave, 217, 256;
Return moved for, 558, 580

Marriages (Ireland) Bill [Bill 32]

(Sir E. Grogan, Mr. Vance, Mr. Longfield)

- c. Read 1^o* Feb. 23
Order for Second Reading discharged, and Bill withdrawn, Mar. 26

Marriages, &c. (Ireland) Bill [Bill 40]

(Sir E. Grogan, Mr. Vance, Mr. Longfield)

- c. Read 1^o* Feb. 26
Read 2^o, after short Debate, Mar. 5, 1118

Marriages Registration (Ireland) Bill
[Bill 39]

(Mr. Monsell, Lord Naas, Mr. Herbert)

- c. Read 1^o* Feb. 26, 856

VOL. CLXIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

MARSH, Mr. M. H., Salisbury

Tobacco Duties, 2R. 713

MARTIN, Mr. P. W., Rochester

Beer, Sale of, 410
Bills of Exchange, &c. (Metropolis), 2R. 855
Corrupt Practices at Elections, Consid. cl. 11, 1895
Innkeepers' Liability, Leave, 338
Navy Estimates—Artificers, &c. at Home, 836, 838

MASSEY, Mr. W. N. (Chairman of Committees) Salford

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1267;—Commissariat Establishment, 1455;—Works, &c. at Home and Abroad, 1774
Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. add. cl. 1646
Liverpool Licensing, 2R. 396
Metropolitan Railway Schemes, Papers moved for, 610
Private Bills—Standing Order 120, 722, 723
Regent Circus Railway, 2R. 1026
South Eastern Railway, 2R. 403
Thames Conservancy, 2R. 495
Union Relief Aid Act Continuance, Comm. add. cl. 970, 972

Metropolis Turnpike Roads Acts Amendment Bill [Bill 47]

(Mr. G. Hardy, Sir W. Jolliffe)

- c. Read 1^o* Mar. 3, and referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills, 1039
Read 2^o* Mar. 16

Metropolitan Buildings—Finsbury Circus

Question, Capt. Jervis; Answer, Mr. Cowper, 411

Metropolitan and City Police

Question, The Earl of Dalhousie; Answer, Earl Granville, 1595
Observations, Sir De Lacy Evans; Reply, Sir G. Grey, 1396, 1404

Metropolitan Bridges and Railways

Question, Mr. Tite; Answer, Mr. Cowper, 498

Metropolitan Railways and the Dwellings of the Poor

Petition (The Earl of Shaftesbury), referred, 1019

Metropolitan Railways

Question, Vict. Enfield; Answer, Mr. M. Gibson, 1028

Metropolitan Railway Schemes

Amendt. on Comm. of Supply (Feb. 20)—Motion for Reports (Mr. Harvey Lewis), 608;
Question, "That the words &c." put, and negatived; Words added; Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to, 613
Parl. Papers—Commons
Col. Yolland's Report. No. [3121]
Private Bills (Metropolis) Reports No. 107
Mr. Parnalgette's Report. No. 197

MILES, Sir W., Somersetshire, E.
Cholera in the Punjab, 1129

Militia Estimates—Preparation of Resolution to discontinue Select Committee
(Sir G. Lewis) Feb. 9, 198

Militia Pay Bill
(Mr. Massey, Sir G. Lewis, Judge Advocate)
c. Ordered * Mar. 24

MILLS, Mr. A., Taunton
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1271;—Commissariat Establishment, Amendt. 1446, 1448, 1454, 1456;—Works, &c. at Home and Abroad, 1778
Breach of Privilege—Mr. E. J. Reed, 878
Circuit Regulations Commission, 308
Convicts, Sentences on, 1331
Coolie Immigration into the Island of Réunion, Papers moved for, 1813
Private Bills, 309
Volunteer Act, 1227

MILLS, Mr. J. R., Chepping Wycombe
India—Medical Service, 1325
Telegraphs, Comm. cl. 7, 1790

MILNES, Mr. R. M., Pontefract
Greece—Affairs of, Papers moved for, 1491
Poland—Affairs of, Address moved, 898
South Eastern Railway, 2R. 403

MITFORD, Mr. W. T., Midhurst
Register of Voters, Comm. 1056

MONCREIFF, Right Hon. J. see ADVOCATE,
*The Lord

MONSELL, Right Hon. W., Limerick Co.
Army Estimates—Commissariat Establishment,
1466;—Clothing Establishment, 1459;—
Manufacturing Departments, 1768
Births, &c. Registration (Ireland), Comm. 549;
cl. 9, 618; cl. 18, 621; cl. 23, 621
Illegitimate Children (Ireland), Comm. cl. 1, 345
Marriages Registration (Ireland), Leave, 855
Obsolete Vessels of War, 1088
Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), 2R. 248; Comm.
1907, 1983

MONTAGU, Lord R., Huntingdonshire
Address in answer to the Speech, 100
Appropriation Bill, 729
Appropriation of Supplies, Resolution, 1848,
1860, 1863, 1864
Brazil—Relations with, Resolution, 1139
College of Arms—Change of Name, Returns moved for, 1578
corrupt Practice at Elections, 2R. 519
Sydney, Viscount, and Mr. Budden, 636, 636

MONTROSE, Duke of Scotland, Roads in, 294

MOORE, Mr. J. B., Lincoln
Brazil—Relations with, Resolution, 1130, 1207

MOWBRAY, Rt. Hon. J. R., Durham City
Durham University Commission, 186

MUNDY, Mr. W., Derbyshire, S.
Union Relief Aid Act Continuance, Leave, 292

Municipal Elections Bill* [Bill 19]
(Mr. Aug. Smith, Mr. Cox, Mr. Dillwyn)
c. Read 1* Feb. 13, 338
Second Reading moved (Mr. Cox) Mar. 3, 1040; Amendt. "upon this day six months" (Mr.
G. Hardy); After Debate, Question put,
"That 'now' &c."—A. 58, N. 93, M. 35;
Words added
Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to;
Bill put off for six months

MURRAY, Mr. W., Newcastle-under-Lyme
Bankruptcy Returns, 1551

Music and Dancing Licences
Question, Visct. Enfield; Answer, Sir G. Grey, 221

Mutiny Bill
(Mr. Massey, Sir G. Lewis, Judge Advocate)
c. Ordered * Mar. 11
Read 1* Mar. 12; 2* Mar. 16
Considered in Committee Mar. 19, and reported, without Amendment, 1649
Read 3* Mar. 19
l. Read 1* (Earl de Grey) Mar. 24
Read 2* Mar. 26

NAAS, Right Hon. Lord, Cockermouth
Births, &c. Registration (Ireland), Leave, 309;
Comm. Instruction, 547, 549; cl. 9, 619; cl.
18, Amendt. 620; cl. 23, Amendt. 621; Consid.
cl. 23, Amendt. 1017
Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), 2R. 247; Comm.
1984
Vaccination (Ireland), 2R. 1793

Naval Coast Volunteers Act Amendment
Bill [H.L.] (No. 19)

l. Read 1* (The Duke of Somerset) Feb. 23
Read 2*, after Debate, Mar. 2, 962
Committee and Report* Mar. 3
Read 3* Mar. 5
c. Read 1* Mar. 6; 2* Mar. 9
Committee and Report* Mar. 12
Third Reading moved Mar. 16, 1547; Amendt.
"upon this day six months" (Mr. H. Berke- ley), 1548; Question, "That 'now' &c."
put, and agreed to
Bill read 3*, and passed
Royal Assent Mar. 27 [26 & 27 Vict., c. 5]

Navy

Devonport Dockyards Men, Question, Mr. Fer-
rard; Answer, Lord C. Paget, 1030
Dockyard Police, Superintendents of, Amendt.
on Comm. of Supply (Feb. 23)—Resolution (Sir J. Elphinstone), 654; Question, "That the words &c." put, and agreed to Dockyard Promotion, Question, Mr. Ferrard;
Answer, Lord C. Paget, 724
Flogging in the, Observations, Mr. W. Williams, 668

Navy—cont.

Naval Prize Money, Question, Sir J. Hay ; Answer, Lord C. Paget, 1065

Promotion and Retirement, Resolution (Sir J. Hay) Feb. 24, 731; Amendt. (Viscount Palmerston), 749; After long Debate, Question, "That the words &c." put, and negatived; Words added; Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to; Select Committee appointed

Nominated Mar. 2.—Mr. Walpole, Sir F. Baring, Sir J. Pakington, Lord C. Paget, Sir J. Hay, Mr. Stansfeld, Sir J. Elphinstone, Mr. Ayrton, Sir H. Willoughby, Sir H. Verney, Sir W. Miles, Mr. Finlay, Mr. Maguire, Mr. Dodson, and Mr. Spourfield

Papers relating to, Parl. P. 51

Obsolete Vessels of War, Observations, Mr. Cobden, 1071

Reed, Mr., Appointment of, Question, Sir F. Smith; Answer, Lord C. Paget, 572

"Royal Oak," The, and the "Royal Sovereign," Question, Mr. Layard; Answer, Lord C. Paget, 408

Sailors' Homes, Question, Sir H. Stracey; Answer, Lord C. Paget, 146

Shoeburyness, Trials at, Question, Sir J. Pakington; Answer, Lord C. Paget, 1653

Wooden Frames for Iron Ships, Amendt. on Committee of Supply Mar. 12 (Mr. Lindsay), 1332; After long Debate, Question put, "That the words &c."—A. 154, N. 81, M. 73, 1390; Main Question put and agreed to

Neutral Rights

Question, Mr. S. Fitzgerald; Answer, Viscount Palmerston, 1745

New Writs during the Recess

For Stoke-upon-Trent, Southampton, Totnes, Andover, Kent (Eastern Division), Totnes, Reigate

New Writs ordered

Feb. 5—For Devonport, Cambridge Town, Somerset (Western Division), Cambridge County, 65

Feb. 11—For Lisburn

Feb. 12—For Devizes

Feb. 16—For Bandon Bridge, Chichester

Mar. 16—For Lancaster

New Members sworn

Feb. 5—William Cubitt, esq., Andover; William Anderson Rose, esq., Southampton; John Pender, esq., Totnes; Henry Riversdale Grenfell, esq., Stoke-upon-Trent; Sir Edward Cholmely Dering, bart., Kent (Eastern Division); Alfred Seymour, esq., Totnes

Feb. 6—D. W. Pack Beresford, esq., Carlton Co.

Feb. 9—G. W. G. Leveson Gower, esq., Reigate

Feb. 13—F. S. Powell, esq., Cambridge Borough

Feb. 16—Lord George Manners, Cambridge Co.

Feb. 17—William Ferrand, esq., Devonport

Feb. 19—W. H. P. Gore Langton, esq., Somerset (Western Division)

Feb. 23—J. Abel Smith, esq., Chichester

Feb. 24—Hon. W. Wells Addington, Devizes

Feb. 26—J. Doherty Barbour, esq., Lisburn

Mar. 26—Marquess of Hartington, Lancaster Co. (Northern Div.)

New South Wales

Australia and New Zealand Postal Service, Question, Mr. Maguire; Answer, M. C. Fortescue, 343

Export of Gold, Question, Mr. T. Hankey; Answer, Chancellor of Exchequer, 641

New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia, Petitions and Observations, Earl Grey Reply, The Duke of Newcastle, 1803

Sydney Branch Mint, Question, Mr. Alderman Salomons; Answer, Chancellor of Exchequer, 641

New Zealand, State of

Postal Service with, Question, Mr. Maguire; Answer, Mr. C. Fortescue, 343

Resignation of Sir G. Grey, Question, Colonel Wilson Patten; Answer, Mr. C. Fortescue, 574

NEWCASTLE, Duke of (Secretary of State for the Colonies)

Convict System.—Tickets of Leave, 257

Illegitimate Children (Ireland), 2R. 1211, 1123

New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia, Petitions, 1805

Princess Alexandra, Reception of the, 1222

Western Australia.—Transportation, 861

NEWDEGATE, Mr. C. N., Warwickshire, N.

Address in answer to the Speech, Report, 157

Appropriation of Supplies, Resolution, 1864

Army Estimates.—Manufacturing Departments, 1761

Army Expenditure, Accounts of, 1254

Church Rates Commutation, 233

Game Laws, Comm. moved for, 1560, 1572

Italy.—Commercial Treaty with, 430

Poland.—Affairs of, Address moved, 892, 906, 919

Prince and Princess of Wales' Annuities, Comm. 739

Prison Ministers, Leave, 466

Qualification for Offices Abolition, 2R. Amendt. 469; 3R. Amendt. 1045, 1052

Tobacco Duties, 2R. 999

Transportation and Penal Servitude, Resolution, 1246

Union Relief Aid Act Continuance, 2R. 541

Niger Expedition, The

Question, Lord A. Churchill; Answer, Lord C. Paget, 797

NORMANBY, Marquess of

Italy.—Affairs of Rome, 374, 377, 378, 386, 393; Explanation, 474, 475, 790;—Despatches, 1062

NORRIS, Mr. T. J., Abingdon

Beer, Sale of, Licences for, 1228

Metropolitan Railway Schemes, Papers moved for, 612

Procession and Illumination Accidents, Returns moved for, Amendt. 1867

South Eastern Railway, 2R. 403

Thames Conservancy, 2R. 494

Thames Embankment (North Side), Leave 359

NORTH, Col. J. S., Oxfordshire

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1271 ;—Volunteers, 1707 ;—Enrolled Pensioners, &c. 1709 ;—Works, &c. at Home and Abroad, 1771, 1777, 1779 ;—Military Education, 1781 ;—Miscellaneous Services, 1783 ;—Administration of the Army, ib., 1784
 Burmese Prize Money, 797
 Cavalry Regiments, Command Pay in, Resolution, 1753, 1754
 Farquharson, The Convict, 1129
 Procession and Illumination Accidents, Returns moved for, 1868
 Security from Violence, 2R. 1307
 Stoppage of Officers' Pay for Forage, Address moved, 1843

NORTHCOTE, Sir S. H., Stamford

Navy Estimates—Naval Stores, 852
 Postage, Foreign and Colonial, 1930
 Post Office Savings Banks, Comm. Resolution, 325
 Security from Violence, 2R. 1812
 Tobacco Duties, Comm. Resolution, 335 ; 2R. 707, 982 ; Comm. cl. 1, 1818
 Transportation and Penal Servitude, Resolution, 1244

Oaths Relief in Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Bill* [Bill 74]

(Mr. E. Craufurd, Mr. Crum-Ewing, Mr. Baxter)
c. Read 1^o Mar. 20
 Read 2^o, after short Debate, Mar. 26, 1981

O'BRIEN, Sir P., King's Co.

Address in answer to the Speech, 115
 Railway Bills, Leave, 175

Office of Secretary at War Abolition Bill* [Bill 72]

(Sir George Lewis, The Judge Advocate)
c. Read 1^o Mar. 20
 Read 2^o, after short Debate, Mar. 26, 1980

O'HARA, Mr. C. W., Sligo Co.

O'Connor, Michael, Case of, 1694

Opposed Private Bills—Select Committees

The Lords following ; namely—L. Colville of Culross, L. Ponsonby, L. Colchester, L. Stanley of Alderley—appointed, with the Chairman of Committees, a Committee to select and propose to the House the Names of the Five Lords to form a Select Committee for the Consideration of each Opposed Private Bill, Mar. 2

Ordnance—Select Committees

Select Committee appointed Feb. 20, "to inquire into the expenditure incurred since the beginning of 1859 on various natures of improved Ordnance, whether obtained by contract or manufactured in the Public Departments, and into the results obtained by such expenditure."

Committee nominated Feb. 26 :—Mr. Monsell, Sir George Lewis, General Peel, Captain Jervie, Mr. Baring, Sir Frederic Smith, Mr. Dodson, Sir John Hay, Lord Robert Cecil, Mr. Laird, Major O'Reilly, Mr. Beecroft, Sir Morton Peto, and Mr. Vivian

Colonel Dunne added, Feb. 27

Ordnance, Cast Iron

Question, Mr. Kinnaird ; Answer, Sir George Lewis, 1467

O'REILLY, Major M. W., Longford Co.

Army Estimates—General Staff, 1443

Ostend and Calais—Mail Packet Contract

Question, Mr. H. Berkeley ; Answer, Chancellor of Exchequer, 1391

Outlawries Bill

c. Read 1^o Feb. 5

OVERSTONE, Lord

Police, Metropolitan and City, 1604

PACKE, Mr. C. W., Leicestershire, S.

Corrupt Practices at Elections, 2R. 523 ;
 Comm. add. cl. 1813
 Public-houses, Leave, 1553, 1554

PAGET, Rear-Adm. Lord C. E. (Secretary of the Admiralty), Sandwich

China—Naval Aid to, 1607, 1608
 Devonport Dockyards Men, 1030
 Dockyard Promotion, 724
 Emigration from the Cotton Districts, 1069
 Ionian Islands—Harbour in the Adriatic, 686
 Naval Coast Volunteers Act Amendt. 3R. 1548
 Naval Prize Money, 1065
 Navy Estimates, Men and Boys, 669, 673, 682, 690, 703 ;—Admiralty Office, 823 ;—Coast Guard Service, &c. 829, 830, 831 ;—Scientific Departments of the Navy, 832, 833 ;—Naval Establishments at Home, 833, 834, 835 ;—Artificers, &c. at Home, 835, 836, 837, 839 ;—Artificers, &c. Abroad, 840 ;—Naval Stores, 842, 843, 844, 847, 848 ;—New Works, 1109, 1110, 1111, 1112, 1113

Navy—Promotion and Retirement, Address moved, 770 ;—Wooden Frames for Iron Ships, Resolution, 1345, 1379, 1393

Niger Expedition, The, 797

Obsolete Vessels of War, 1091

Portsmouth Dockyard, 1852

Reed, Mr. Appointment of, 572, 798, 801, 873

"Royal Oak" and "Royal Sovereign," 409

Sailors' Homes, 146

Shoeburyness, Trials at, 1853

Sydney, Viscount and Mr. Budden, Explanation, 573, 574, 633, 637

Transport Service, The, 666

Whitworth Shell, The, 1855

PAGET, Lord A. H., Lichfield

Police, Metropolitan and City, 1400

PAGET, Mr. C., Nottingham

Army Estimates—Clothing Establishment, 1458
 Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 2,
 Amendt. 1004 ; add. cl. 1644
 Municipal Elections, 2R. 1041

PAKINGTON, Rt. Hon. Sir J. S., Droitwich

Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, 673, 674, 681 ;
 —Coast Guard Service, &c. 1831 ;—Scientific Departments of the Navy, 833 ;—Artificers, &c. Abroad, 840 ;—Naval Stores, 844, 845, 846, 848, 1853

PAKINGTON, Right Hon. Sir J. S.—cont.

Navy—Promotion and Retirement, Address moved, 776, 782, 788;—Wooden Frames for Iron Ships, Resolution, 1376, 1379
Obsolete Vessels of War, 1076, 1095, 1096, 1103, 1106
Reed, Mr., Appointment of, 873
Shoeburyness, Trials at, 1653

PALK, Sir L., Devonshire, S.

Cape of Good Hope, German Settlers at, 1392
Cotton Districts, Commission moved for, 581

PALMER, Sir R. see SOLICITOR GENERAL, The PALMERSTON, Rt. Hon. Viscount (First

Lord of the Treasury) Tiverton
Address in answer to the Speech, 122, 133
Adjournment of the House, 725, 1130
Cotton Trade, State of the, 1652
Egypt—Labour in, 578;—Deportation of Negroes from, 653
Galway Postal Subsidy, 187; Resolution, 1688
Greece—Affairs of, 194, 1128; Papers moved for, 1506, 1527
Ionian Islands—Cession of Territory, 230, 412, 413;—Military Expenditure, 1946
Municipal Elections, Leave, 1042
Navy Estimates—Admiralty Office, 822;—Naval Stores, 845, 847, 850, 853, 854
Navy—Promotion and Retirement, Address moved, Amendt. 749;—Wooden Frames for Iron Ships, Resolution, 1382
Neutral Rights, 1745
Poland—State of, 229;—Convention between Russia and Prussia, 576;—Congress of Paris (1856), 578;—Arrest of Polish Students, 644;—Affairs of, Address moved, 902;—Case of M. Abicht, 1654;—Treaty of Vienna, 1751
Prince of Wales, Marriage of, 408, 728, 1130
Prince of Wales—Message from the Queen, Address moved, 413; Comm. Resolution, 498
Prince and Princess of Wales' Annuities, 2R. 649; Comm. 789
Public Accounts, Committee on, Nomination of Comm. 717
Supply—Niger Expedition, 1963, 1964
Thames Embankment (North Side), Leave, 361
Treasure Trove, 1070
United States—Blockade of Charleston, 410;—French Mediation, 728

Park Lane, South Entrance to

Question, Mr. Goddard; Answer, Mr. Cowper, 1332

PARKER, Major W., Suffolk, W.

Malt Duty, 2R. 544

Parliament, Meeting of the Parliament opened by Commission Feb. 5

LORDS—

Speech of the Lords Commissioners Feb. 5, 3

Address to HER MAJESTY moved thereon by the Earl of DUDLEY, seconded by the Earl of GRANARD, and after long Debate agreed to, Nomine Dissentiente, 8

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER reported Feb. 9, 179

[cont.

Parliament, Meeting of the—cont.

COMMONS—

THE LORDS COMMISSIONERS' SPEECH reported Feb. 5

Address thereon moved by Mr. CALTHORPE, seconded by Mr. BAZLEY, and after long Debate agreed to, 86; Report of Address brought up, and after Debate agreed to Feb. 6, 160

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER reported Feb. 10, 225

Parliament, The New Houses of—The Prescoes

Question, Mr. Cavendish Bentinok; Answer, Mr. Cowper, 1656

Partnership Law Amendment

Considered in Committee*; Resolution Feb. 19

Partnership Law Amendment Bill [Bill 26]

(Mr. Scholefield, Mr. Murray, Mr. Stansfeld)

Read 1^o Feb. 19

Second Reading moved (Mr. Scholefield) Mar. 24, 1869; Amendt. "upon this day six months" (Mr. Buchanan); After long Debate, Question, "That the word 'now' do." put—A. 56, N. 39, M. 17

M. Q. put, and agreed to; Bill read 2^o

Committed to Select Comm.* Mar. 25

Members:—Mr. T. Baring, Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Cave, Mr. W. Forster, Mr. George, Mr. M. Gibson, Mr. G. G. Glynn, Mr. K. Hodgson, Mr. Malins, Mr. Moffatt, Mr. Murray, Mr. Potter, Mr. Scholefield, Mr. Vance, Mr. Wedgellin

PATTEN, Col. J. W., Lancashire, N.

*Fustian Cutting Operatives, 1393

New Zealand—Resignation of Sir G. Grey, 574

Private Bills, Fees on, 259, 260; Resolution, 408;—Standing Order 120, 723

Standing Orders, Select Comm. on, 258

Union Relief Aid Act Continuance, Leave, 275; 2R. 528, 542; Comm. add. cl. 969, 970, 975

PAULI, Mr. H., St. Ives

Game Laws, Comm. moved for, 1567

Princess Alexandra, Entry of the, 1069

Paupers, Emigration of

Question, Mr. Stanley; Answer, Mr. Villiers, 1324

Paymaster General's Office—Supply

1960

PEACOCKE, Mr. G. M. W., Maldon

Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 8, 1015; cl. 11, 1642, 1643

Crown Lands, Inclosure of, Address moved for, 309

Diplomatic Service, Resolution, 1945

Fires in the Metropolis, 1467

Ionian Islands—Cession of Territory, 228

PEEL, Right Hon. Sir R. (Chief Secretary for Ireland) Tamworth

Assurances Registration (Ireland), 796, 1745
Births, &c. Registration (Ireland), Leave, 204,
213, 214; Comm. 552; cl. 9, 614, 616, 618,
619; cl. 18, 620; cl. 23, 621; cl. 30, 622;
Consid. cl. 23, 1017
Braddel, Mr., Murder of, 1896
Brophy, Mary, Case of, 1652
Cork, Riots at, 1552
Distress in Ireland, 602, 604
Drainage of Land (Ireland), Leave, 177
Fairs and Markets (Ireland), 1928
Federal Recruiting in Ireland, 1930
Game Laws (Ireland), 574
Growing Crops, Seizure of, (Ireland), 1031
Illegitimate Children (Ireland), Leave, 223, 224;
2R. 265; Comm. cl. 1, 344; cl. 4, 348
Land Tenure (Ireland), 808, 575
Marriage Law (Ireland), 1698
Marriages (Ireland), 2R. 1118, 1120
Marriages Registration (Ireland), Leave, 856
O'Connor, Michael, Case of, 1695
Outdoor Relief (Ireland), 725
Political Demonstrations in Ireland, 1933, 1935,
1936
Poor Law (Patrick Bourke), Paper moved for, 460
Poor Relief (Ireland), 1928
Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), Leave, 178; 2R.
244, 725; Comm. 1062, 1983
Vaccination (Ireland), 2R. 1791, 1792

PEEL, Right Hon. Lieut.-Gen. J., Huntingdon

Army Estimates—Land Forces, Amendt. 1262,
1267, 1274;—Pay and Allowances, Amendt.
1276, 1277, 1279;—General Staff, 1426, 1429,
1431, 1446;—Medical Establishments, 1546;
—Manufacturing Departments, 1759
Militia Estimates, Resolution, 203

PEEL, Right Hon. F. (Joint Secretary to the Treasury) Bury

Arterial Drainage (Ireland), 1809
Book Post to India and China, 796
Cape of Good Hope—Mail Contract, 1326
Constabulary Horses, 1809
Court of Probate, Officers of the, 1895
Crown Lands, Inclosure of, Address moved, 312
Fisheries, Board of, (Ireland), 1028
Phoenix Park (Dublin), 497
Postage, Foreign and Colonial, 1929, 1930
Shannon, River, 1743
Superintendents of Dockyard Police, Comm.
moved for, 655
Supply, 192, 1908;—Civil Services, 1953;—
Customs Department, 1954;—Inland Revenue
Department, 1955;—Post Office Services, 1956;—Houses of Parliament, 1957;—Superintendent of County Roads, South Wales, 1961;—Secret Services, 1961;—Printing and Stationery, 1962;—Superannuation and Retired Allowances, 1965, 1967
Treasure Trove, 1070

PETO, Sir S. M., Finsbury

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1272;—Pay and Allowances, Amendt. 1279;—Barrack Establishment, 1544;—Manufacturing Departments, 1761

PETO, Sir S. M.—cont.

Burials, Leave, 1120
Cape of Good Hope—Mail Contract, 1326
Navy Estimates—Admiralty Office, 822, 826;
—Artificers, &c. at Home, 838;—Naval Stores, Amendt. 840, 848
Navy—Wooden Frames for Iron Ships, Resolution, 1368
Obsolete Vessels of War, 1102, 1103
Regent Circus Railway, 2R. 1024

PHILLIPS, Mr. G. L., Pembrokeshire
Corrupt Practices at Elections, 2R. 518

PIGOTT, Mr. Serjeant G., Reading
Corrupt Practices at Elections, 2R. 519;
Comm. cl. 8, 1632; cl. 11, 1634
Prison Ministers, Leave, 467
Railway Bills, Leave, 176

Poland

Question, The Earl of Ellenborough; Answer,
Earl Russell, 560;—Observations, The Earl of Ellenborough; Explanation, Earl Russell, 857
Question, Mr. Hennessy, 192;—Questions, Mr.
Hennessy, Mr. Darby Griffith; Answer, Viscount Palmerston, 226
Abicht, M., Case of, Question, Mr. Hennessy;
Answer, Viscount Palmerston, 1653
Affairs of, Amendt. to Comm. of Supply (Feb. 27)—Motion for an Address (Mr. Hennessy), 879; After long Debate, Amendt.
withdrawn
Congress of Paris, 1856, Statement, Viscount
Palmerston, 578
Convention between Russia and Prussia, Question, Mr. W. Ewart; Answer, Viscount
Palmerston, 576
English Police in Poland, Questions, Mr. Hennessy; Answer, Sir George Grey, 1225,
1329, 1469, 1656
Polish Refugees in Prussia, Question, the Earl of Shaftesbury; Answer, Earl Russell, 1794
Polish Students, Reported Arrest of, Question,
Mr. D. Griffith; Answer, Viscount Palmerston, 644
Treaty of Vienna, The, Question, Mr. Hennessy; Answer, Viscount Palmerston, 1745
Parl. Papers—Commons
Correspondence in 1856 . . . No. [3097]
Correspondence, Nos. [3111] [3150] [3154]

POLLARD-URQUHART, Mr. W., Westmeath
Co.

Army Estimates—General Staff, 1440
Transportation and Penal Servitude, Resolution, 1250

Poor Law

Administration of the, Question, Mr. Hibbert;
Answer, Mr. C. P. Villiers, 1066
Bourke, Patrick, Case of, Motion for Papers (Lord J. Browne) Feb. 17, 448; After Debate, Motion agreed to (Parl. P. 751);—
Question, Lord J. Browne; Answer, Mr. C.
P. Villiers, 795
Brophy, Mary, Case of, Question, Mr. Vance;
Answer, Mr. C. P. Villiers, 1651
Parl. P. 104

Poor Relief (Ireland) Act

Question, Sir E. Grogan; Answer, Sir R. Peel, 1328

Poor Relief (Ireland) Act Amendment Bill [H.L.] (No. 12)

(Viscount Lifford)

Read 1st Feb. 20

Read 2nd, and referred to Select Committee on Illegitimate Children (Ireland) Bill (which see) Mar. 6, 1125

Question, Sir E. Grogan; Answer, Sir R. Peel, 1328

Poor Removal

Question, Mr. Herbert; Answer, Mr. C. P. Villiers

Portsmouth Dockyard

Question, Mr. Laird; Answer, Lord C. Paget, 1652

Post Office Savings Banks

Considered in Committee Feb. 13; Resolution (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer), 320

Post Office Savings Banks Bill [Bill 22]

(Mr. Massey, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Peel)

Read 1st Feb. 16, 343

Read 2nd, after short Debate, Feb. 26, 854

Considered in Committee Mar. 3 (A.P.), 1018

Considered in Committee Mar. 5, 1115

cl. 1, Amendt. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), agreed to cl. 2, Amendt. (Mr. Ayrton), agreed to

cl. 5 agreed to

add. cl. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), added

Bill reported

Considered as amended Mar. 9

Re-Committal in respect of cl. 1, and Report,*

Mar. 13

Considered as amended* Mar. 16

Read 3rd, after short Debate, and passed, Mar. 17, 1688

Read 1st Mar. 19 (No. 47)

Read 2nd, after short Debate, Mar. 24, 1797

Committee Mar. 26; Amendments made, 1917

Postage, Foreign and Colonial

Question, Mr. Cave; Answer, Mr. Peel, 1929

POTTER, Mr. E., Carlisle

Union Relief Aid Act Continuance, Leave, 287

POWELL, Mr. F. S., Cambridge

Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 2, 1008; cl. 5, Amendt. 1012

POWELL, Mr. J. J., Gloucester

Corrupt Practices at Elections, 2R. 516; Committee, cl. 2, 1007; cl. 8, 1016; cl. 11, 1635, 1643

POWIS, Earl

Business, Public, 184

Prince of Wales (Queen's Message)

Brought up Feb. 17; Address thereon, 1413

Considered in Committee Feb. 19; Resolutions thereon, 498

Prince and Princess of Wales' Annuities Bill [Bill 30]

(Mr. Massey, Visct. Palmerston, Sir G. Grey)

Read 1st Feb. 20

Read 2nd, after Debate, Feb. 23, 644

Considered in Committee Feb. 24, 789

Reported without Amendt.

Read 3rd Feb. 26

Read 1st Feb. 26

(No. 24)

Read 2nd Feb. 27, 864

Committee and Rep.* Mar. 2

Read 3rd, and passed, Mar. 3

Royal Assent Mar. 5 [26 & 27 Vict., c. 1]

Princess Alexandra, Reception of, see Alexandra, Princess

Printing

Select Committee appointed Feb. 16:—Members, Sir F. Baring, Mr. Bonham-Carter, Mr. Cardwell, Mr. Divett, Mr. S. Estcourt, Mr. Gaskell, Mr. Greene, Mr. Henley, Sir S. Northcote, The O'Connor Don, Sir J. Pakington, Mr. Peel, Mr. H. Russell, Mr. Walpole

Prison Discipline

Select Committee appointed Feb. 19, to consider and report on the present State of Discipline in Gaols and Houses of Correction (Earl of Carnarvon)

Committee:—Ld. President, D. Richmond, D. Marlborough, M. Salisbury, L. Steward, E. Carnarvon, D. Malmesbury, E. Romney, E. Cathcart, E. Ducie, E. Dudley, V. Eversley, L. Wodehouse, L. Wensleydale, L. Lyveden

Observations, Earl of Carnarvon, 476

Prison Ministers Bill [Bill 24]

(Sir G. Grey, Mr. Bruce)

Read 1st Feb. 17, 460

Question, Mr. Kinnaird; Answer, Sir G. Grey, 967

Private Bills

LOARDS—Orders respecting Feb. 24 (Parl. P. No. 21), 717

COMMONS—Standing Order 120 repealed; Order in lieu thereof, Feb. 24, 723;—Question, Mr. A. Mills; Answer, Mr. M. Gibson, 309

Private Bills Fees

COMMONS—Resolution (Mr. R. Hodgson) Feb. 17; After Debate, withdrawn, 405

Question, Mr. Hodgson; Answer, Mr. M. Gibson, 258

Private Bill Legislation

Select Committee appointed Feb. 17, "to inquire into the present system of legislation with regard to undertakings requiring the authority of Private Acts of Parliament, and whether any improvements can be made therein" (Mr. M. Gibson), 468

Private Bill Legislation—cont.

Instruction moved (Mr. Hadfield) ; Motion withdrawn.

Committee nominated Feb. 20, as follow :—
Mr. M. Gibson, Mr. Lowe, Colonel W. Patten,
Mr. Adair, Mr. Whalley, Mr. R. Hodgson,
Lord Stanley, Mr. E. P. Bouverie, Mr. Walpole,
Mr. Massey, Mr. Puller, Mr. Hassard, Mr. Paull,
Mr. C. Forster, and Mr. Liddell

Mr. Hassard disch., Mr. Hennessy added,
Feb. 24

Privilege, Breach of—Mr. E. J. Reed

On complaint of Sir F. Smith, Ordered, that
E. J. Reed do attend this House To-morrow,
Feb. 28, 798

Mr. Reed attends, and having been heard, excused further attendance, 877

Privileges (LORDS)

Ordered, That a Committee of Privileges be appointed, Feb. 5

Privileges, Committee for (COMMONS)

Appointed Feb. 5

Prize Money (China)

Question, Colonel W. Stuart ; Answer, Sir G.
Lewis, 968

PROBY, Lord (Comptroller of the Household) Wicklow Co.

Address in answer to the Speech ; Her Majesty's Answer, 220

Procession and Illumination Accidents (Metropolis)

Motion for an Address (Mr. H. Lewis) Mar.
24, 1865 ; Amendt. (Mr. Norris), 1868 ; After long Debate, Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to ;
Parl. P. 196 ; 233, 278

Public Accounts, Committee of Nomination of Committee (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer) Feb. 23, 715 ; Amendt. (*Mr.

Hennessy*) ; On Question, A. 48, N. 21, M.
25, 715

Motion, "That the Debate be now adjourned"
(Mr. Hennessy)—A. 12, N. 39, M. 27 ; 718

Motion, "That this House do now adjourn," negated

List of Committee :—Sir F. Baring, Mr. E.
P. Bouverie, Sir S. Northcote, Mr. Peel, Mr.
G. C. Glyn, Mr. Cobden, Sir H. Willoughby,
Mr. Howes, and Mr. Walpole

Public Business

Question, The Earl of Powis ; Answer, Earl Granville, 194

Observations, The Earl of Derby ; Answer,
Earl Granville, 339

Public-houses Bill [Bill 67]

(Mr. Somes, Mr. Pease)

Motion, "That leave &c." (Mr. Somes)—
A. 141, N. 52, M. 89 ; 1552

Ordered Mar. 17 ; Read 1^o Mar. 19

Public Petitions

Select Committee appointed Feb. 10

Members—Mr. Bonham-Carter, Mr. Calcutt,
Mr. W. Cubitt, Mr. J. Fergusson, Mr. C.
Forster, Mr. Gard, Major Gavin, Capt. Gray,
Mr. Gregson, Sir E. Grogan, Mr. H. Johnstone, Mr. T. J. Miller, Mr. H. Russell, Mr.
Ald. Salomons, Mr. O. Stanley

PULLER, Mr. C. W. G., Hertfordshire

Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 2, Amendt. 1002, 1004 ; add. cl. 1644 ; Consid.
cl. 11, 1895

Malt Duty, Leave, 364 ; 2R. 545

Union Relief Aid Act Continuance, Leave, 291

Qualification for Offices Abolition

Considered in Committee * Feb. 6 ; Resolution

Qualification for Offices Abolition Bill

[Bill 4]

(*Mr. Hadfield, Sir M. Peto, Mr. Baines, Mr.
Kershaw*)

c. Read 1^o * Feb. 6, 178

Second Reading moved (Mr. Hadfield) Feb. 18,
469 ; Amendt. "upon this day six months"
(Mr. Newdegate) ; Question put, "That 'now'
&c."—A. 74, N. 63, M. 11

Main Question put, and agreed to ; Bill read 2^o
Division List—Ayes and Noes, 470

Order for Committee Feb. 19, 566 ; Motion,
"That Mr. Speaker &c. ;" Motion, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Pecker), withdrawn ; Main Question put, and agreed
to

Bill considered in Committee, and reported without Amendt.

Third Reading moved Mar. 4, 1043 ; Amendt.
"upon this day six months" (Mr. Newdegate), 1045 ; After Debate, Question put, "That 'now' &c."—A. 175, N. 172, M. 3 ; M. Q.
put, and agreed to

Bill read 3^o, and passed, 1053

Division List—Ayes and Noes, 1053

l. Read 1^o * Mar. 5

Queen's Prison, The, Southwark

Question, Mr. Locke ; Answer, Mr. Cowper, 341

Railway Accidents

Question, Mr. Bentinck ; Answer, Mr. M. Gibson, 261

Railway Bills Bill [Bill 6]

(Mr. Whalley, Mr. M. Mahon)

c. Read 1^o * Feb. 6, 172

Railway Proxies

Question, Mr. D. Griffith ; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, 409

Ramsgate Harbour

Question, Sir E. Dering ; Answer, Mr. M. Gibson, 1930

RAVENSWORTH, Lord

Harbours of Refuge, 248, 255

Redemption of Rents (Ireland) Bill [H.L.]

(No. 29) (Lord Chelmsford)

l. Read 1st Mar. 5REDESDALE, Lord (Chairman of Committees)
East Gloucestershire Railway, 2R. Amendt. 718, 719

Entailed Estates, Charging of, for Railways, Comm. moved for, 1217

Great Eastern Railway, 2R. Adj. moved, 630, 633, 1319

Post Office Savings Banks, 2R. 1797; Comm. 1917

Reed, Mr. E. J.—see *Privilege, Breach ofRegent Circus Railway Billc. Second Reading moved Mar. 3, 1021; Amendt. "upon this day six months" (Mr. H. Lewis); After Debate, Question, "That 'now' &c." put, and negatived; Words added
Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to; Bill put off for six monthsRegister of Voters Bill [Bill 25]

(Mr. L. King, Mr. K. Seymour)

c. Read 1st Feb. 19; 2nd Feb. 24

Order for Committee Mar. 4; Motion, "That Mr. Speaker &c." 1055; Amendt. for Committee "upon this day six months" (Mr. Howes), 1055; Aftershort Debate, Question put, "That the words &c."—A. 129, N. 104, M. 25

Main Question put, and agreed to; House in Committee cl. 1, Amendt. (Mr. Howes), 1057; Question put, "That those words be there inserted"—A. 76, N. 99, M. 23

Remaining Clauses agreed to Bill reported without Amendt.Read 3rd Mar. 5l. Read 1st Mar. 6

(No. 34)

Registration of Assurances

Question, Sir E. Grogan; Answer, Sir R. Peel, 796

ROBERTSON, Mr. D., Berwickshire

Regent Circus Railway, 2R. 1022, 1025

ROBERTSON, Mr. H., Shrewsbury

Navy—Wooden Frangs for Iron Ships, Resolution, 1365

ROBNUCK, Mr. J. A., Sheffield

Address in answer to the Speech, 133

Affirmations, 2R. 1294

Army Estimates—Commissariat Establishment, 1449

Benchers' Jurisdiction and Authority, 728

Breach of Privilege—Mr. E. J. Reed, 802

College of Arms—Change of Name, Returns moved for, 1573, 1580, 1582

Galway Contract, The, Resolution, 1684

Ionian Islands—Cession of Territory, 229, 412, 413;—Military Expenditure, 946

Poor Law (Patrick Bourke), Paper moved for, 459

Public-houses, Leave, 1553

Tobacco Duties, Comm. Resolution, 335; 2R. 953, 954

VOL CLXIX [THIRD SERIES.]

Roll of Lords

Delivered Feb. 5

ROLT, Mr. J., Gloucestershire, W.

Telegraphs, Comm. cl. 26, 1975, 1977; add. cl. 1979

Roman Catholic Marriages Registration (Ireland) Bill [Bill 73]

(Mr. Butt, Sir G. Bowyer)

c. Read 1st Mar. 20Rome, see Italy*ROSE, Mr. Ald. W. A. (Lord Mayor of London) Southampton

Police, Metropolitan and City, 1398, 1402

Procession and Illumination Accidents, Returns moved for, 1868

Thames Embankment (North Side), Leave, 355

Union Relief Aid Act Continuance, Leave, 280

Rotherham, Disease inQuestion, Mr. Childers; Answer, Sir G. Grey, 1395; Parl. P. No. 151RUSSELL, Earl (Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs)

Address in answer to the Speech, 41, 49, 54, 55

Brazil—Dispute with, Explanation, 367

Italy—Affairs of Rome, 383, 386, 474, 791, 794;—Despatches, 1062

Poland—Insurrection in, 564, 570;—Convention between Russia and Prussia, 857, 858;

—Refugees in Prussia, 1794

United States—The Southern Confederacy, 1734

RUSSELL, Mr. A., Tavistock

Rome—Affairs of, 1425

Russia and China

Question, Colonel Sykes; Answer, Mr. Layard, 842

Sailors' Homes

Question, Sir Henry Stacey; Answer, Lord Clarence Paget, 146

ST. GERMAN, Earl of (Lord Steward of the Household)

Address in answer to the Speech—Her Majesty's Answer, 179

Births and Deaths Registration (Ireland), 2R. 1300; Comm. 1795; cl. 22, 1796; Report, cl. 30, 1917

Sale of Beer Bill

Question, Mr. P. W. Martin; Answer, Mr. W. E. Forster, 410

Sale of Gas Act Amendment Bill [Bill 61]

(Mr. Bruce, Sir George Grey)

c. Read 1st Mar. 17

SALISBURY, Marquess of
Prison Discipline, 491

Salmon, Exportation of

Question, Mr. Tucker Smith; Answer, Sir George Grey, 724

Salmon Exportation Bill [Bill 42]

(Mr. Bruce, Sir George Grey)

c. Read 1^o Feb. 26; 2^o Mar. 9

Committee and Report Mar. 11

Read 3^o Mar. 12

l. Read 1^o (The Lord Stanley of Alderley) Mar. 13 (No. 39)

Read 2^o, after short Debate, Mar. 16

Committee Mar. 19

Amendts. reported, Mar. 23, 1741

cl. 8 (Prohibition of Export of Salmon at certain Times), Motion (Earl of Dalhousie); On O. Q., Contents 8, Not-Contents 8, Majority 2, 1741 [Division List]

Salmon Fisheries (Ireland) Bill [Bill 1]

(Mr. M'Mahon, Colonel Dunne, Colonel French, Mr. Longfield)

Read 1^o Feb. 6, 178

Second Reading moved (Mr. M'Mahon) Feb. 11, 234

Amendt. (Mr. Butt); After Debate,

Amendt. withdrawn

Main Question agreed to; Bill read 2^o

Question, Mr. Esmonde; Answer, Mr. M'Mahon, 645

Question, Sir Robert Peel; Answer, Mr. M'Mahon, 725

Order for Committee Mar. 4; Motion, "That Mr. Speaker &c." (Mr. M'Mahon) 1057;

Amendt. that "the Bill be committed to a Select Committee" (Lord Fermoy); Debate adjourned

Debate resumed Mar. 25, 1896; Debate arising, Debate further adjourned

Debate resumed Mar. 26, 1892; Motion, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Captain Esmonde)—Ayes 5, Noes 50, Majority 45, 1984

Main Question put, and agreed to

Bill considered in Committee Mar. 26; Committee report Progress

SALOMONS, Mr. Alderman D., Greenwich

Prince of Wales, Marriage of, 408

Sydney Branch Mint, 640

Thames Conservancy, 2R. Amendt. 494

SCHOLEFIELD, Mr. W., Birmingham

Naval Estimates—Naval Establishments at Home, 835

Partnership Law Amendment, 2R. 1869

Schools, Endowed—see Education

SCLATER-BOOTH, Mr. G., Hampshire, N.

Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. add. cl. 1646

Diplomatic Service, Resolution, 1946

Scotland

Edinburgh Castle—Gunpowder Store, Question
The Earl of Airlie; Answer, The Earl of Dalhousie, 1549

Roads in Scotland, Question, Earl of Airlie;
Answer, Duke of Argyle, 293

Salmon Fisheries (Scotland), Question, Mr. Henley; Answer, Sir George Grey, 1129

Supply—Eschequer, Office of, 1960

Vagrancy in Scotland, Question, Mr. Carnegie;
Answer, The Lord Advocate, 967

See—

Oaths Relief in Criminal Proceedings (Scotland) Bill

Statute Labour Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Bill

Statute Labour Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Transfer Bill

Trustees (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill

SCOTT, Lord H. J., Selkirkshire

Greece—Affairs of, Papers moved for, 1518

SCULLY, Mr. V., Cork Co.

Army Estimates—Surveys, &c. 1782

Political Demonstrations in Ireland, 1931, 1932, 1883, 1934, 1936

Secretary at War, Office of, Abolition Bill [Bill 72]

(Sir G. Lewis, The Judge Advocate)

c. Read 1^o Mar. 20

Read 2^o, after short Debate, Mar. 26, 1980

Security from Violence Bill [Bill 35]

(Mr. Adderley, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Garnett)

c. Read 1^o Feb. 24, 785

Second Reading moved (Mr. Adderley) Mar. 11, 1803; Amendt. "upon this day six months" (Mr. Hadfield), 1305; After Debate, Question put, "That 'now' &c."—Ayes 131, Noes 68, Majority 63, 1313

Main Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2^o

SERLY, Mr. C., Lincoln

Naval Estimates—Artificers, &c. at Home, 838;—Naval Stores, 848

Partnership Law Amendment, 2R. 1893

Select Vestries Bill

l. Bill, pro forma, read 1^o Feb. 5

Selection, Committees of

Nominated Feb. 12

Committee:—Mr. Dunlop, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Bonham-Carter, Lord Hotham, Mr. Mowbray, and the Chairman of the Select Committee on Standing Orders

SELWYN, Mr. C. J., Cambridge University

Qualification for Offices Abolition, 3R. 1047

Sewage Commission

Question, Mr. Ker Seymer; Answer, Dr. Brady, 967

SETMER, Mr. H. K., Dorsetshire
Register of Voters, Comm. 1066
Sewage Commission, 967

SEYMOUR, Mr. Henry DANBY, Poole
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1275 ;—Pay and Allowances, 1283
Church Building Acts, 1066
Convict Prisons, Report, 968, 1031
Coolie Immigration into the Island of Réunion, Papers moved for, 1816
Distinguished Service Colonels, 1947
Ecclesiastical Courts, 1066
Ecclesiastical Revenues, Select Comm. 215
Greece—Affairs of, 194 ; Papers moved for, 1514, 1518
Japan—Affairs of, 1419
Poland—Affairs of, Address moved, 927
Transportation and Penal Servitude, Resolution, 1241

SEYMOUR, MR. W. DIGBY, Southampton
Abbeokuta, Vice Consul at, 664

SHAFTESBURY, Earl of Ecclesiastical Patronage of the Lord Chancellor, 1391
Great Eastern Railway, 2R. Amendt. 1315, 1323, 1909
Metropolitan Railways, Dwellings of the Poor, 1019
Poland—Convention between Russia and Prussia, 85 ;—Refugees in Prussia, 1793, 1794

SHELLEY, Sir J. V., Westminster
Army Estimates—Volunteers, 1707
Bridge Street, Westminster, 1067
Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 11, 1643
Distinguished Service Colonels, 1951
Regent Circus Railway, 2R. 1027
Supply—Civil Services, 1954
Telegraphs, Comm. cl. 7, 1789 ; cl. 26, 1977 ; add. cl. 1980
Thames Embankment (North Side), 2R. 1314

SHERIDAN, Mr. H. B., Dudley
Fire Insurance Duty, 186

Shoeburyness—Trials at
Question, Sir J. Pakington ; Answer, Lord C. Paget, 1653

SIDNEY, Mr. Alderman T., Stafford
Aggravated Assaults on Women and Children, 2R. Amendt. 472
Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 2, 1005, 1009
Partnership Law Amendment, 2R. 1893
Police, Metropolitan and City, 1406
Thames Conservancy, 2R. 495
Union Relief Aid Act Continuance, Leave, 286 ; 2R. 533

SMITH, Lieut. Gen. Sir J. M. F., Chatham
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1267 ;—Manufacturing Departments, 1762 ;—Works, &c. at Home and Abroad, 1772 ;—Military Education, 1781
Army Expenditure, Accounts of, 1254

SMITH, Lieut. Gen. Sir J. M. F.—cont.
Breach of Privilege—Mr. E. J. Reed, Resolution, 798, 801, 802, 878
Ionian Islands, 663
Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, 705 ;—Naval Stores, 849
Reed, Mr., Appointment of, 572
Sydney, Viscount, and Mr. Budden, 638

SMITH, Mr. Augustus, Truro
Diplomatic Service, Resolution, 1942
Municipal Elections, Leave, 338 ; 2R. 1041
Navy Estimates—Scientific Department of the Navy, 833
Prince of Wales—Message from the Queen, Comm. Resolution, 503
Supply, 1908 ;—Civil Services, 1952, 1953, 1954 ;—Inland Revenue Department, 1955 ;—Houses of Parliament, 1957 ;—Board of Trade, 1958, 1960 ;—Superintendent of County Roads, South Wales, 1961 ;—Printing and Stationery, 1962 ;—Niger Expedition, 1963, 1964

SMITH, Mr. J. B., Stockport
Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), 2R. 242
Union Relief Aid Act Continuance, Leave, 292 ; Comm. add. cl. 972

SMITH, Mr. M. T., Chepping Wycombe
Salmon, Exportation of, 724

SMOLLETT, Mr. P. B., Dumbartonshire
Address in answer to the Speech, 122
Madras Irrigation Company, 341
Nawab of the Carnatic, Resolution, 808

Smyrna—Poll Tax at
Question, Mr. Wyld ; Answer, Mr. Layard, 1326

SMYTH, Col. J. G., York
Delhi Prize Money, 261

SOLICITOR GENERAL, The (Sir R. Palmer)
Richmond

Barristers (Ireland), 798
Benchers' Jurisdiction and Authority, Leave, 225
Brazil—Relations with, Resolution, 1197
British Territory, Alienation of, 1807, 1809
Church Building Acts, 1066
College of Arms—Change of Names, Returns moved for, 1583
Corrupt Practices at Elections, Consider. cl. 11, 1895
Jurors' Remuneration, Leave, 788
Oaths Relief in Criminal Proceedings (Scotland), 2R. 1991
Partnership Law Amendment, 2R. 1891
Writs Prohibition, Leave, 789

SOMERSET, Duke of (First Lord of the Admiralty)

Brazil, Relations with, 1211, 1213, 1214
Great Eastern Railway, 2R. 1911
Greenwich Park, Railway through, 1743
Harbours of Refuge, 252, 255
Naval Coast Volunteers Act Amendment, 2R. 962, 964

SOMES, Mr. J., Kingston-upon-Hull
Public-houses, Leave, 1552

South Australia—Separation of Districts
New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia, Petitions and Observations, Earl Grey;
Reply, The Duke of Newcastle, 1803

South Eastern Railway Bill

c. Read 1^o Feb. 9

Second Reading moved Feb 17, 401; Amendt.
"upon this day six months" (Mr. Dodson);
Question put, "That 'now' &c."—A. 111,
N. 142, M. 11; Words added
Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to;
Bill put off for six months

SPEAKER, The (Right Hon. J. E. Denison)
Nottinghamshire, N.

Appropriation Bill, 729, 730, 731

Appropriation of Supplies, Resolution, 1863

Brazil—Outrage in, 148

Breach of Privilege—Mr. E. J. Reed, 799, 801

Poland—State of, 193

Political Demonstrations in Ireland, 1932, 1933

Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), Comm. 1063, 1984

Sydney, Viscount, and Mr. Budden, 574, 636

Thames Embankment (North Side), Leave,
354

STACPOOLE, Capt. W., Ennis

Princess Alexandra, Entry of the, 1067

Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), Comm. 1983

Standing Orders—(LORDS)

Committee on Private Bills appointed Feb. 17

Committee:—Ld. President, D. Somerset, M.
Winchester, M. Bath, M. Ailesbury, L. Steward, E. Airlie, E. Hardwicke, E. Carnarvon, E.
Romney, E. Chichester, E. Powis, E. Verulam,
E. Beauchamp, E. De Grey, E. Stradbroke, E.
Amberst, L. Chamberlain, V. Eversley, L.
Camoy, L. Saye and Sele, L. Colville of Culross, L. Ponsonby, L. Wycombe, L. Sondes,
L. Foley, L. Dinevor, L. Wodehouse, L. Sheffield,
L. Colchester, L. Silchester, L. De Tabley, L.
Wynford, L. Portman, L. Stanley of Alderley,
L. Aveland, L. Belper, L. Ebury, L. Churston,
L. Egerton

Standing Orders—(COMMONS)

Select Committee nominated Feb. 12

Members:—Colonel Wilson Patten, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Henley, Mr. Wrightson, Mr. Herbert,
Mr. Bramston, Mr. Bonham-Carter, Mr.
Lefroy, Mr. Dunlop, Mr. Puller, and Mr.
Edward Egerton

STANHOPE, Earl

Convict System—Tickets of Leave, 215

Entailed Estates, Charging of, for Railways,
Comm. moved for, 1219

Western Australia—Transportation, Paper
moved for, 858

STANILAND, Mr. M., Boston

Register of Voters, Comm. 1056

STANLEY, Right Hon. Lord, King's Lynn
Army Estimates—Commissariat Establishment,
1450

India—Port of Sedasheghur, 189

Union Relief Aid Act Continuance, Leave, 285

STANLEY of ALDERLEY, Lord (Postmaster General)

Business, Public, 340

Galway Packet Contract, 1127, 1128

Post Office Savings Banks, 2R. 1797; Comm
1917, 1918

Salmon Exportation, 2R. 1463, 1464; Report,
cl. 3, 1741

Standing Orders Comm. on Private Bills, 366

STANLEY, Hon. W. O., Beaumaris

Paupers, Emigration of, 1324

STANSFELD, Mr. J., Halifax

Poland—Affairs of, Address moved, 913

Spirit Duties, 497

Statute Labour Roads and Bridges
(Scotland) Bill [Bill 63]

(Sir J. Ogilvy, Sir J. Fergusson, Sir A. Agnew, Mr. W. Leslie)

c. Read 1^o Mar. 17

Statute Labour Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Transfer Bill [Bill 64]

(Sir John Ogilvy, Mr. Kinnaird)

c. Read 1^o Mar. 17

STIRLING, Mr. W., Perthshire

Italy—Affairs of Rome, 1416

Stock Certificates to Bearer Bill [Bill 76]

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Peel)

c. Read 1^o Mar. 26

STRACEY, Sir H. J., Great Yarmouth

Army Estimates—Works, &c. at Home and Abroad, Amendt. 1773, 1777

Fortifications at Great Yarmouth, 643, 1701

Sailors' Homes, 146

STRADBROKE, Earl of

Great Eastern Railway, 2R. 1318

STRATHERDEN, Lord

Volunteer Force, 720

United States—The Southern Confederacy,
1714

STUART, Col. W., Bedford

Army Estimates—Martial Law, 1546

China—Prize Money, 966

Prison Ministers, Leave, 467

STURT, Mr. H. G., Dorsetshire

Royal Levees and Drawing Rooms, 798

Subscriptions, Public

Question, Sir J. Hay; Answer, Sir G. Grey, 572

Supplies, Appropriation of

Observations, Mr. Speaker; Lord Robert Montagu, 729

Motion (Lord Robert Montagu) Mar. 24, 1848; After long Debate, Motion withdrawn;—Motion (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer), 1863; Amendt. (Mr. Hadfield), 1864; On Question, Amendt. agreed to; Main Question, as amended, agreed to.

SUPPLY

Lords Commissioners' Speech consid.* Feb. 9; Motion, "That a Supply be granted to Her Majesty;" House in Committee to consider the said Motion, Feb. 10

Resolved, "That a Supply be granted to Her Majesty"

Resolution reported Feb. 11

Supply—Committee deferred Feb. 13

Supply considered in Committee Feb. 23, 669
NAVY ESTIMATES.

- (1.) 76,000 Men and Boys (Lord C. Paget), 669
After long Debate, Vote agreed to
 - (2.) £2,921,951, Wages
 - (3.) £1,416,986, Victuals and Clothing
- Resolutions reported Feb. 24

Supply considered in Committee Feb. 26

NAVY ESTIMATES.

- (1.) £165,322, Admiralty Office, 818
After Debate, Vote agreed to
 - (2.) £299,695, Coast Guard Service, Royal Naval Coast Volunteers, and Royal Naval Reserve, 828
 - (3.) £71,961, Scientific Departments, 832
 - (4.) £183,316, Naval Establishments at Home, 833
 - (5.) £36,370, Naval Establishments Abroad
 - (6.) £1,112,878, Wages to Artificers, 835
Motion to report Progress (Mr. Lindsay), withdrawn, 837
 - After Debate, Original Question agreed to, 840
 - (7.) £69,957, Wages to Artificers, &c. Abroad, 840
 - (8.) £1,334,051, Naval Stores, 840
Amendt. (Sir M. Peto), negatived, 840
Motion to report Progress (Mr. Lindsay)—A. 13, N. 74, M. 61, 844
 - Amendt. (Mr. Lindsay), 847; Motion withdrawn
 - Original Question agreed to
 - (9.) £857,349, Steam Machinery
- Resolutions reported Feb. 27

Supply considered in Committee Feb. 27
Committee report Progress

Supply considered in Committee Mar. 5

NAVY ESTIMATES.

- (1.) £433,298, New Works, Improvements, &c. 1109
 - (2.) £66,000, Medicines and Medical Stores
 - (3.) £99,370, Naval Miscellaneous Services
 - (4.) £719,341, Half Pay, &c.
 - (5.) £483,105, Pensions and Allowances
 - (6.) £194,932, Civil Pensions and Allowances
 - (7.) £270,150, Freight of Ships
- Resolutions reported Mar. 6

Supply considered in Committee Mar. 6
Committee report Progress

Supply—cont.

Supply considered in Committee Mar. 9, 1254

ARMY ESTIMATES.

- Land Forces, 148,242 Men (Sir G. Lewis), 1262
- Amendt. (Mr. Williams), 1270; On Question, A. 19, N. 77, M. 58, 1276
- Original Question agreed to
- £5,709,733, General Staff and Regimental Pay, &c. 1276
- Amendt. (General Peel), 1276; On Question, A. 58, N. 64, M. 6, 1279
- Amendt. (Sir M. Peto), 1279; On Question, A. 28, N. 96, M. 68, 1280
- Original Question again proposed
- Motion to report Progress (Sir J. Trelawny)—A. 25, N. 80, M. 55, 1283
- Motion, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair" (Mr. White), negatived, 1284
- Resolution reported Mar. 11

Supply considered in Committee Mar. 12
Committee Report Progress

Supply considered in Committee Mar. 13, 1426

ARMY ESTIMATES.

- (1.) £5,709,733, General Staff and Regimental Pay, &c. 1426
 - (2.) £1,223,936, Commissariat Establishment, 1446
 - Amendt. (Mr. A. Mills), 1446; After Debate withdrawn
 - Amendt. (Mr. A. Mills), 1456; On Question—A. 65, N. 71, M. 6
 - Original Question agreed to
 - (3.) £630,385, Clothing Establishments, 1457
 - Motion to report Progress (Col. Dickson), withdrawn, 1457
 - Amendt. (Col. Dickson), 1457; After short Debate, negatived
 - Original Question agreed to
- Resolutions reported Mar. 16

Supply considered in Committee Mar. 16

ARMY ESTIMATES.

- (1.) £635,637, Barrack Establishment, 1544
 - (2.) £46,097, Divine Service
 - (3.) £43,012, Martial Law, 1545
 - (4.) £255,998, Medical Establishments, 1546
 - (5.) £751,084, Disembodied Militia, 1547
 - (6.) £94,162, Yeomanry, 1547
- Motion to Report Progress (Lord Lovaine), withdrawn; Vote agreed to
- Resolutions reported Mar. 17

Supply considered in Committee Mar. 20

ARMY ESTIMATES.

- (1.) £321,884, Volunteers, 1703
 - Amendt. (Lord Lovaine), 1704; After Debate, withdrawn; Vote agreed to
 - (2.) £55,847, Enrolled Pensioners and Army Reserve, 1709
 - £956,365, Manufacturing Departments, 1709
 - Amendt. (Sir H. Willoughby), 1710
- Committee Report Progress
- Resolutions reported Mar. 23

Supply considered in Committee Mar. 23

- (1.) £956,365, Manufacturing Departments, 1757
 - Amendt. (Sir H. Willoughby); On Question—A. 45, N. 94, M. 49
- Original Question agreed to

[cont.]

[cont.]

Supply—cont.

- (2.) £838,369, Warlike Stores, 1770
 (3.) £810,941, Superintending Establishment of Works, Buildings, &c. 1770 Amendt. (Sir H. Stracey), 1774; Motion, being irregular, not put Amendt. (Mr. Baxter), 1780; On Question—A. 43, N. 75, M. 32
 Original Question agreed to
 (4.) £172,201, Military Education, 1781
 (5.) £85,441, Surveys, &c. 1781
 (6.) £88,135, Miscellaneous Services, 1782
 (7.) £213,177, Administration of the Army, 1783
 (8.) £25,933, Rewards for Military Service
 (9.) £77,782, Pay of General Officers
 (10.) £464,895, Pay of Reduced and Retired Officers
 (11.) £172,157, Widows' Pensions and Compassionate Allowances
 (12.) £32,843, Pensions and Allowances to Wounded Officers
 (13.) £33,776, In-Pensioners of Chelsea and Kilmainham Hospitals
 (14.) £1,142,702, Out-Pensioners of Chelsea Hospital
 (15.) £144,964, Superannuation Allowances, &c. 1786
 (16.) £32,786, Disembodied Militia
 Resolutions reported Mar. 24
 Supply—Civil Service Estimates—Mar. 25; Order for Committee; Debate arising thereon, Committee deferred, 1908
 Supply considered in Committee Mar. 26, 1952
 CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.
 (1.) £1,953, on account of certain Civil Services, 1952
 (2.) £574,154, Customs Department, 1954
 (3.) £1,351,771, Inland Revenue Department, 1955
 (4.) £2,098,920, Post Office Services, &c. 1955
 (5.) £515,796, Superannuations and Compensation Allowances, &c.
 (6.) £56,986, The Houses of Parliament, 1957
 Votes (7.) to (52.)
 "To complete the sums" for the several services named:— (7.) £38,730, Treasury
 (8.) £19,263, Home Office
 (9.) £56,325, Foreign Office
 (10.) £23,047, Colonial Office
 (11.) £14,637, Privy Council Office
 (12.) £47,181, Board of Trade, &c. 1958
 (13.) £1,994, Privy Seal Office
 (14.) £6,741, Civil Service Commission
 (15.) £14,640, Paymaster General's Office
 (16.) £2,923, Department of the Comptroller General of the Exchequer
 (17.) £22,857, Office of Works and Public Buildings
 (18.) £19,839, Office of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues
 (19.) £15,235, Office of Public Records, &c.
 (20.) £157,424, Poor Law Commissions
 (21.) £37,901, Mint
 (22.) £19,610, Inspectors of Factories, &c.
 (23.) £4,316, Exchequer and other Offices in Scotland
 (24.) £2,445, Household of the Lord Lient. of Ireland.
 (25.) £11,580, Offices of the Chief Secretary for Ireland

Supply—cont.

- (26.) £2,752, Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums, Ireland.
 (27.) £16,314, Office of Public Works, Ireland
 (28.) £25,060, Commissioners of Audit
 (29.) £14,351, Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commission
 (30.) £10,090, Inclosure and Drainage Acts; Imprest Expenses
 (31.) £35,511, General Register Offices
 (32.) £10,982, National Debt Office
 (33.) £2,910, Public Works Loan and West India Islands Relief Commissions
 (34.) £5,111, Lunacy Commissions
 (35.) £1,223, General Superintendent of County Roads, South Wales, 1961
 (36.) £2,374, Registrars of Friendly Societies
 (37.) £12,243, Charity Commission
 (38.) £4,495, Office in London under the Local Government Act, &c.
 (39.) £2,342, Agricultural and Emigration Statistics (Ireland)
 (40.) £1,193, Landed Estates Record Offices
 (41.) £1,098, Quarantine Expenses
 (42.) £24,000, Foreign and other Secret Services, 1961
 Motion to report Progress (Mr. W. Williams), withdrawn
 Original Question agreed to
 (43.) £244,139, Printing and Stationery, 1962
 (44.) £90,025, Postage of Letters on the Public Service
 (45.) £9,662, Treasury Chest
 (46.) £6,500, Expedition to the Niger (Dr. Baikie), 1963
 Motion to report Progress (Col. Sykes), withdrawn
 Original Question agreed to (47.) £66,000, Bounties on Slaves, &c.
 (48.) £6,950, Mixed Commissions
 (49.) £116,462, Superannuation and Retired Allowances, 1965
 (50.) £744, Toulonese and Corsican Emigrants, &c.
 (51.) £325, Refuge for the Destitute
 (52.) £1,966, Polish Refugees and Distressed Spaniards, 1966
 (53.) £55,700, Merchant Seamen's Fund Pensions
 (54.) £10,400, to complete the sum for Relief of Distressed British Seamen Abroad
 (55.) £2,625, to complete the sum for Miscellaneous Allowances formerly on Civil List, &c.
 (56.) £1,451, to complete the sum for Public Infirmaries (Ireland)
 (57.) £1,800, to complete the sum for the Westmoreland Lock Hospital
 (58.) £700, Rotunda Lying-in Hospital
 (59.) £200, Coombe Lying-in Hospital
 (60.) £4,600, to complete the sum for the House of Industry, Dublin
 (61.) £1,500, to complete the sum for the Cork Street Fever Hospital
 (62.) £600, Meath Hospital
 (63.) £100, St. Mark's Ophthalmic Hospital
 (64.) £1,300, Dr. Steevens' Hospital
 (65.) £245, Board of Superintendence of Dublin Hospitals

[cont.]

[cont.]

Supply—cont.

- (66.) £5,847, to complete the sum for the Concordatum Fund
 (67.) £25,278, Non-conforming, Seceding, and Protestant Dissenting Ministers in Ireland, 1966; A. 53, N. 26, M. 27

Resolutions reported Mar. 27

Sydney, Viscount, and Mr. Budden

Personal Explanation, Lord C. Paget, 573;—
 Personal Explanation, Lord C. Paget; Lord R. Montagu, 633

Sydney Branch Mint

Question, Mr Alderman Salomons; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, 640

SYKES, Col. W. H., Aberdeen City

Address in answer to the Speech, 97
 Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1268;—General Staff, 1431;—Warlike Stores, 1770;—Works, &c. at Home and Abroad, 1774
 Book Post to India and China, 796
 China—British Officers in, 187;—Aid from Russia, 342;—Col. Burgevine's Corps, 1416, 1755, 1757
 East India Company's Army, Officers of the, 1466
 Navy Estimates—New Works, 1110, 1111
 Nawab of the Carnatic, Resolution, 817
 Supply—Printing and Stationery, 1662;—Niger Expedition, Adj. moved, 1963, 1964, 1970
 Transportation and Penal Servitude, Resolution, 1250

TALBOT, Capt. Hon. W. C., Waterford City

Navy Estimates—New Works, 1110, 1112
 Navy—Promotion and Retirement, Address moved, 767
 Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), Comm. 1061

TAUNTON, Lord

Great Eastern Railway, 2R. 1819
 Police, Metropolitan and City, 1602

Telegraphs Bill [Bill 16]

(Mr. M. Gibson, Mr. Hutt)

- c. Read 1^o Feb. 12, 293; 2^o Feb. 19
 Committee and Report Feb. 26
 Considered in Committee (on Re-Comm.) and Report Mar. 12
 Considered in Committee (on 2nd Re-Comm.) Mar. 19, 1648
cl. 3 agreed to, 1648
cl. 5, Amendt. (Lord A. Churchill), negatived; cl. 6 agreed to, 1648
cl. 6, 1649
 Debate arising. Committee report Progress
 Considered in Committee Mar. 23, 1788
cl. 7, Amendt. (Mr. Blackburn), 1788; Question put, "That those words be there inserted"—A. 45, N. 87, M. 22; cl. 8 agreed to, 1790; Amendt. (Mr. Dalglish), agreed to; cl. 10 agreed to, 1791
 Committee report Progress
 Considered in Committee Mar. 26, 1970
cl. 16, Amendt. (Mr. Blackburn), negatived; cl. 17 agreed to, 1970
cl. 18, Amendt. (Mr. Henley), agreed to; cl. 19 agreed to, 1971

Telegraphs Bill—cont.

- cl. 23* agreed to, 1972
cl. 25 agreed to, 1972
cl. 26, Amendt. (Mr. Henley) agreed to, 1974; cl. 27 agreed to add. cl. (Mr. Dalglish), negatived, 1978
add. cl. (Mr. Butt), withdrawn, 1978
add. cl. (Mr. Dillwyn), withdrawn, 1979
add. cl. (Mr. Lygon), withdrawn, 1979
 Bill reported
 Parl. Papers—Commons . . . Bill 16
 As amended in Committee . . Bill 38
 „ on Re-committal . . Bill 57
 „ on Second Re-comm. . Bill 75
 „ on Consideration . . Bill 78

Thames Conservancy Bill

c. Read 1^o Feb. 11

Second Reading moved Feb. 19, 494; Amendt. "upon this day six months" (Mr. Ald. Salomons), 494; Question, "That 'now' &c." put, and negatived; Words added; Bill put off for six months, 496

Thames Conservancy, &c.

On Motion of Mr. Hutt, Select Committee appointed Mar. 19, "to inquire into the operation of the several Acts of Parliament relating to the Conservancy of the River Thames, to the Buoyage, Beaconage, and Ballastage of that River from Staines to Yantlet Creek, and to the regulation of vessels navigating or plying on the River between the aforesaid limits" (Mr. Hutt), 1649

Committee nominated April 16:—Mr. Hutt, Lord Mayor of London, Sir J. Hanmer, Mr. W. Wood, Mr. J. Ewart, Mr. Ald. Salomons, Mr. Longfield, Mr. Locke, Mr. Cave, Mr. Somes, Mr. R. Hodgson, Mr. Lindsay, Mr. Blackburn, Mr. Shafto, and Mr. Cubitt

Thames Embankment (North Side) Bill

[Bill 23]

(Mr. Cowper, Mr. Peel)

c. Read 1^o Feb. 16, 348

Read 2^o, after Debate, and committed to a Select Committee Mar. 11, 1813 Committee nominated Mar. 17:—Mr. Cowper, Mr. William Cubitt, Mr. Bramston, Mr. Tite, Mr. Western Wood, Mr. Ayrton, and Five Members to be nominated by the Committee of Selection
Mr. W. Wood disch., Mr. Crawford added, Feb. 18

Thames Embankment (South Side) Bill

[Bill 65]

(Mr. Cowper, Mr. Peel)

Read 1^o, after Debate Mar. 17, and referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills, 1684

THOMPSON, Mr. H. S., Whitby

Game Laws, Comm. moved for, Amendt. 1664

THYNNE, Lord H. F., Wiltshire, S.

Federal Recruiting in Ireland, 1980

Tickets of Leave

Question, Mr. Denman; Answer, Sir George Grey, 572;—see Convicts

Ticket-of-Leave Prisoners

Question, Mr. Butler; Answer, Sir George Grey, 263

TITE, Mr. W., Bath

Metropolitan Bridges and Railways, 496; Papers moved for, 609

Regent Circus Railway, 2R. 1025

Thames Conservancy, 2R. 494

Thames Embankment (North Side), 2R. 1314

Tobacco Duties (Customs Acts)

Resolutions in Committee (Feb. 13) reported Feb. 16

Tobacco Duties Bill [Bill 21]

(Mr. Massey, Chancellor of Exchequer, Mr. Peel)

c. Read 1^o Feb. 16

Second Reading moved (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer) Feb. 23, 706; Amendt. for a Select Committee (Mr. Ayrton), 707

Motion, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Cox)—A. 46, N. 90, M. 44, 714

Motion, "That this House do now adjourn" (Colonel Dunne), withdrawn, 714

Debate adjourned

Debate resumed Feb. 27, 946; After long Debate, Motion, "That the Debate be now adjourned" (Dr. Brady)—A. 71, N. 137, M. 66, 958

Motion, "That this House do now adjourn" (Sir Hugh Cairns)—A. 70, N. 134, M. 64, 958

Debate further adjourned

Debate resumed Mar. 2, 980; After long Debate, Amendt. withdrawn

M. Q. put, and agreed to; Bill read 2^o, 1001

Order for Committee Mar. 5; After short Debate, Committee deferred, 1114

Bill considered in Committee, and reported, Mar. 9, 1285

Question, Mr. Crawford; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, 1468

Order for Comm. (on Re-Commitment) Mar. 19;

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," 1608; Amendt. for a Select Committee (Mr. Ayrton), 1611; Question put,

"That the words &c."—A. 170, N. 87, M. 83, 1616; Main Question put, and agreed to

Bill considered in Committee

cl. 1 (Duties on Manufactured Tobacco), after Debate, amended, and agreed to, 1616

Remaining Clauses agreed to; Bill reported

Considered as amended Mar. 23, 1787; Amendt. (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer), agreed to

Read 3^o Mar. 24

Read 1^o Mar. 24

Read 2^o Mar. 26; Committee negatived;

Standing Orders Nos. 37 and 38 dispensed with; Bill read 3^o, and passed Mar. 26

Royal Assent Mar. 27 [26 & 27 Vict., c. 4]

TORRENS, Mr. R., Carrickfergus

Forest Rights and Inclosures, Comm. moved, 1031, 1038

Oude, State of, 966

TORRINGTON, Viscount

Greenwich Park, Railway through, 1741

Transport Service, The

Question, Mr. Lindsay, 657; Answer, Lord C. Paget, 666

Transportation and Penal Servitude

Amendt. on Committee of Supply Mar. 9;

Motion for an Address (Mr. Adderley), 1279;

After Debate, withdrawn

Transportation Commission

Question, Sir J. Walsh; Answer, Sir G. Grey, 575; — see Convicts

Treasure Trove

Observations, Sir J. Jervoise; Answer, Mr. Peel, 1069

TRELAWNY, Sir J., Tavistock

Address in answer to the Speech, Report, 161

Affirmations, Leave, 223; 2R. 1285

Army Estimates—Pay and Allowances, 1278;

Adj. moved, 1283;—Administration of the Army, 1783, 1784

Army—Staff Appointments, 1229

Church Rates Abolition, Leave, 176

Prince of Wales—Message from the Queen, Comm. Resolution, 507

Prince and Princess of Wales' Annuities, 2R. 647, 649

TRURO, Lord

Prison Discipline, 491

Volunteer Commission, 144, 721

Trustees (Scotland) Act Amendment Bill [Bill 59]

(The Lord Advocate, Sir W. Dunbar)

c. Ordered Mar. 12

Read 1^o Mar. 13; 2^o Mar. 16

Committee and Report Mar. 19

Read 3^o Mar. 20

l. Read 1^o Mar. 23

(No. 53)

Turkey

Poll Tax at Smyrna, Question, Mr. Wyld; Answer, Mr. Layard, 1326

TURNER, Mr. C., Lancashire, S.

Telegraphs, Comm. cl. 16, 1970; cl. 26, 1976

Turnpikes, Abolition of

Question, Mr. Western; Answer, Mr. H. A. Bruce, 1806

Underground Railway

Question, Sir G. Bowyer; Answer, Mr. M. Gibson, 575

Union Relief Aid Act (1862) Continuance Bill [Bill 17]

(Mr. Villiers, Mr. Gilpin)

c. Read 1^o Feb. 12, 267

Read 2^o, after Debate, Feb. 19, 526

Question, Mr. Cobden; Answer, Mr. O. P. Villiers, 798

Considered in Committee Mar. 9

cl. 1, amended, and agreed to, 968

cl. 2, amended, and agreed to, 969

add. cl. (Mr. Villiers), agreed to, 969

add. cl. (Mr. Villiers), agreed to, 969

[cont.]

Union Relief Aid Act Continuance Bill—cont.

add. cl. (Mr. Basley), agreed to, 970

add. cl. (Mr. Hibbert) (irregular), 971

Bill reported, after Debate, Mar. 2

Considered as amended Mar. 3

Read 3^d Mar. 5

l. Read 1st Mar. 6

Read 2^d, after Debate, Mar. 16, 1462

Committee and Report Mar. 17

Read 3^d Mar. 19

United States

Blockade of Charleston, Question, Mr. Bentinck ;
Answer, Viscount Palmerston, 410

Equipment of Vessels for the Confederate States,
Question, Mr. Caird ; Answer, Mr. Layard, 987

Federal Recruiting in Ireland, Question, Lord
H. Thynne ; Answer, Sir R. Peel, 1930

French Mediation between the Federal and Confederate States, Question, Mr. Hopwood ;
Answer, Visct. Palmerston, 728

Neutral Rights, Question, Mr. S. FitzGerald ;
Answer, Visct. Palmerston, 1744

San Juan, The Island of, Question, Mr. Longfield ; Answer, Mr. Layard, 1607

Southern Confederacy, The, Observations, Lord
Campbell ; Reply, Earl Russell, 1714

Parl. Papers—Commons

Despatch relating to Civil War . . [3075]

Correspondence, 1863—

No. 1 The Civil War [3107]

No. 2 The Blockade [3108]

No. 3 The "Alabama" [3109]

No. 4 Despatches and Papers . . . [3119]

No. 5 Neutral Vessels and Mails . . [3127]

No. 6 Neutral Rights and Duties . . [3128]

No. 7 Mail-bags to Matamoras . . . [3144]

No. 8 Confederate Agents in England [3146]

No. 9 Enlistment of British Subjects [3147]

No. 10 Seizure of Mails in "Adela" [3149]

UPTON, Major Gen. Hon. G. F., Antrim Co.
Galway Contract, Resolution, 1691

Vaccination (Ireland) Bill [Bill 70]

(Sir R. Peel, Mr. Lowe)

c. Read 1st Mar. 19

Second Reading moved (Sir R. Peel) Mar. 23, 1791

Motion, "That the Debate be now adjourned"
(Colonel Dunne)—A. 16, N. 37, M. 21, 1793

Motion, "That this House do now adjourn"
(Mr. Whiteside), withdrawn, 1793

Debate adjourned

Debate further adjourned Mar. 24

VANCE, Mr. J., Dublin City

Births, &c. Registration (Ireland), Comm. cl. 9, 618

Brophy, Mary, Case of, 1651

Cork, Riots at, 1552

Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 2,
1008 ; Consid. cl. 11, Amendt. 1894

Marriages (Ireland), 2R. 1118

VANDELEUR, Col. C. M., Clare Co.

Births, &c. Registration (Ireland), Comm. cl. 18,
620 ; cl. 23, 621 ; Consid. cl. 23, 1017

Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), Comm. 1060, 1906

VOL. CLXIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

VANE, Lord H. G., Hastings

Diplomatic Service, Resolution, 1945

VANSITTART, Mr. W., Windsor

India—Government of the North Western Provinces, 1808

VERNEY, Sir H., Buckingham

Army Estimates—Pay and Allowances, 1282 ;—
General Staff, 1439 ;—Works, &c. at Home and Abroad, 1774

Navy Estimates—Admiralty Office, 827

Poland—Affairs of, Address moved, 921 ;—English Police in, 1227

Victoria—Separation of Districts

New South Wales, Victoria, and South Australia, Petitions and Observations, Earl Grey ;
Reply, The Duke of Newcastle, 1803

See Australia

VILLIERS, Right Hon. C. P. (Chief Commissioner of the Poor Law Board)
Wolverhampton

Brophy, Mary, Case of, 1651

Paupers, Emigration of, 1325

Poor Law (Patrick Bourke), Papers moved for,
452, 453, 795

Poor Laws, Administration of the, 1066

Poor Removal, 171

Union Relief Aid Act Continuance, Leave,
267, 292 ; 2R. 526, 542, 798 ; Comm. cl. 2,
Amendt. 969 ; add. cl. 970, 973, 975

VIVIAN, Lord

Volunteer Commission, 146

Volunteer Act, The

Question, Mr. A. Mills ; Answer, Sir G. Lewis, 1227

Volunteer Commission, Report of the Question, Lord Llanover ; Answer, Earl De

Grey and Ripon, 143

Volunteer Force

Question, Lord Stratheden ; Answer, Earl De
Grey and Ripon, 720 ;—Question, Lord Hotham ; Answer, Sir G. Lewis, 221

Capitation Grant to the, Question, Capt. Gray ;
Answer, Sir G. Lewis, 1744

WALCOTT, Vice Admiral J. E., Christchurch

Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, 690 ;—Admiralty Office, 821

Wales, The Prince of

LORDS—His Royal Highness ALBERT EDWARD PRINCE OF WALES took and subscribed the Oath Feb 5

Treaty of Marriage with the PRINCESS ALEX-ANDRA OF DENMARK, Parl. P. [3070]

LORDS—

PRINCE OF WALES—MESSAGE from the QUEEN ;
Address thereon, Feb. 17, 372

Wales, The Prince of—cont.

COMMONS—

PRINCE OF WALES—MESSAGE from HER MAJESTY; Address thereon, Feb. 17, 413
Queen's Message (Feb. 17) considered in Committee Feb. 19, 498; Resolutions thereon Resolutions (Feb. 19) reported Feb. 20
Marriage of the Prince of Wales—Bills of Exchange, &c., Question, Mr. Ald. Salomons; Answer, Visct. Palmerston, 408;—Adjournment, Observations, Visct. Palmerston, 725, 727, 1130

WALPOLE, Rt. Hon. S. H., Cambridge University

Army Expenditure, Accounts of, 1253
Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. cl. 11, 1841
Endowed Schools, 1468
Irish Church, 1468
Liverpool Licensing, 2R. 400
Malt Duty, 2R. 544
Poland—Affairs of, Address moved, 930, 931
Qualification for Offices Abolition, 3R. 1050
Telegraphs, Comm. cl. 18, 1972; add. cl. 1970
Thames Embankment (North Side), Leave, 353

WALSH, Sir J. B., Radnorshire

Address in answer to the Speech, Report, 163
Transportation Committee, 575

WALTER, Mr. J., Berkshire

Education—Postponement of Motion, 1465
Poland—Affairs of, Address moved, 903
Princess Alexandra, Entry of the, 1068

WATLINGTON, Mr. J. W. P., Essex, S.

Forest Rights and Inclosures, Comm. moved for, 1035
Tickets of Leave, 1551

Ways and Means

Considered in Committee Mar. 9
Resolution, Consolidated Fund (£10,000,000)

WEGUELIN, Mr. T. M., Wolverhampton

Post Office Savings Banks, Comm. Resolution, 327

WENSLEYDALE, Lord

Prison Discipline, 491

West Indies, Offices in

Question, Mr. Cave; Answer, Mr. C. Fortescue, 577

WESTBURY, Lord, see CHANCELLOR, The Lord

WESTERN, Mr. T. S., Maldon

Turnpikes, Abolition of, 1806

Western Australia—Transportation

Paper moved for, Earl Stanhope, 858

WHALLEY, Mr. G. H., Peterborough

Address in answer to the Speech, 135, 143
Political Demonstrations in Ireland, 1931
Prince and Princess of Wales' Annuities, 646
Prison Ministers, Leave, 464
Private Bill Legislation, Comm. moved 468
Railway Bills, Leave, 172
South Eastern Railway, 2R. 405

WHITE, Col. L., Kidderminster

Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), 2R. 238; Comm. moved, 1898, 1983, 1984

WHITE, Mr. J., Brighton

Army Estimates—Pay and Allowances, 127
Adj. moved, 1284
Marine Mutiny, Comm. cl. 23, Amendt. 1787
Navy Estimates—Admiralty Office, 821, 822
—New Works, 1110

WHITESIDE, Right Hon. J., Dublin University

Assurances Registration (Ireland), 1745
Braddel, Mr., Murder of, 1692
Corrupt Practices at Elections, Consid. cl. 11, 1894
Galway Contract, The, Resolution, 1681, 1684
Marriage Law (Ireland), 1699
Partnership Law Amendment, 2R. 1892
Political Demonstrations in Ireland, 1933, 1935
Salmon Fisheries (Ireland), Comm. 1906
Vaccination (Ireland), 2R. Adj. moved, 1793

Whitworth Shell, The

Question, Mr. Dalglish; Answer, Lord C. Paget, 1655

WILLIAMS, Mr. W., Lambeth

Army Estimates—Pay and Allowances, 1273;
—General Staff, 1431;—Clothing Establishment, 1457;—Volunteers, 1705;—Works, &c. at Home and Abroad, 1773;—Military Education, 1781;—Administration of the Army, 1783, 1784
Army Expenditure, Accounts of, 1252; Amendt. 1270, 1271

Flogging in the Navy, 668

Liverpool Licensing, 2R. 398

Municipal Elections, 2R. 1040

Navy Estimates—Admiralty Office, 821

Poor Removal, 172

Prince of Wales—Message from the Queen, Address moved, 414, 415; Comm. Resolution, 503

Prince and Princess of Wales' Annuities, 2R. 646

Supply—Civil Services, 1958;—Post Office Services, 1956;—Superintendent of County Roads, South Wales, 1961;—Secret Services, Adj. moved, 1961;—Printing and Stationery, 1962;—Niger Expedition, 1964;—Non-Conforming, &c. Ministers (Ireland), Amendt. 1966, 1967

Thames Conservancy, 2R. 494

Thames Embankment (North Side), Leave, 366; 2R. 1313

Thames Embankment (South Side), Leave, 1586
Tobacco Duties, Comm. Resolution, 834

WILLOUGHBY, Sir H. P., Evesham

Army Estimates, 724;—Manufacturing Departments, Amendt. 1710, 1758, 1765, 1770
Army Expenditure, Accounts of, 1261
Cape of Good Hope—German Settlers at, 1392
Crown Lands, Inclosure of, Address moved, 817
Militia Estimates, Resolution, 202
Navy Estimates—Naval Establishments at Home, 833;—Artificers, &c. at Home, 835, 837;—Naval Stores, 843
Post Office Savings Banks, Comm. Resolution, 326; 2R. 854; Comm. 1018
Prince of Wales—Message from the Queen, Address moved, 414; Comm. Resolution, 502
Prince and Princess of Wales' Annuities, 2R. 644
Supply—Customs Department, 1954;—Inland Revenue Department, 1955;—Post Office Services, 1956;—Printing and Stationery, 1962;—Superannuation and Retired Allowances, 1965
Yarmouth, Defences at, 1702

WODEHOUSE, Lord

Address in answer to the Speech, 63
Prison Discipline, 487

WOOD, Right Hon. Sir C. (Secretary of State for India) Halifax

Burmese Prize Money, 797
Cholera in the Punjab, 1129
Delhi Prize Money, 1394
East India Company's Army, Officers of the, 1466

[cont.]

WOOD, Right Hon. Sir C.—cont.

India—Port of Sedasheghur, 189;—Memorandum of Dinker Rao, 265;—Madras Irrigation Company, 341;—Medical Service, 1325;—Government of the North Western Provinces, 1808
Navy—Promotion and Retirement, Address moved, 782, 783
Nawab of the Carnatic, Resolution, 813, 1328
Obsolete Vessels of War, 1100, 1107, 1109
Onde, State of, 966;—Claims upon, 1393

Write Prohibition Bill [Bill 34]

(Mr. E. P. Bouverie, Mr. Hardcastle)
c. Read 1^o Feb. 24, 789
Withdrawn Mar. 17

Write Prohibition (No. 2) Bill [Bill 62]

(Mr. E. P. Bouverie, Mr. Hardcastle)
c. Read 1^o Mar. 17

WROTTERLEY, Lord

Charitable Endowments, 179

WYLD, Mr. J., Bodmin

Army Estimates—Barrack Establishment, 1544;—Surveys, &c. 1781
Colliery Accidents, 308
Poland—Affairs of, Address moved, 943
Smyrna, Poll Tax at, 1326

Yarmouth, Defences at

Observations, Sir H. Stracey, 1701

END OF VOLUME CLXIX., AND FIRST VOLUME OF SESSION 1863.

